One form of the reverse "Ugly American" was detailed in the recent article "The Japanese Megaphone" by John B. Judis in the New Republic. It, like the speech I did in 1988 on "Who Makes Policy? Them Or Us?" details how our think tanks, lobbyists, and publicists are "tilting the policy debate about our economic future to reflect Japan's views and not the American people."

Judis points out that "the money is also creating what the Japanese call structural corruption—a kind of systemic bias that does not require conscious acts of corruption but yields much the same results."

Mr. Speaker, I include at this point the entire article by Mr. Judis.

THE JAPANESE MEGAPHONE

(By John B. Judis)

Last January Kaoru Kusuda, a slight young woman who joined the Japanese foreign service after graduating from Keio University, arrived in Washington after tours of duty in Great Britain and Singapore. Kusuda, the first Japanese official especially assigned to monitor Washington think tanks, says, "The embassy and the foreign ministry think it is an important thing to follow their activities."

Kusuda's arrival was the latest move in Japan's massive effort to influence American opinion—an effort made more urgent by growing American resentment of Japan's $50 billion annual trade surpluses. According to Pat Choate, a vice president of TRW and Japan critic, who is writing a book on Japanese lobbying, Japanese government agencies, corporations, and foundations spent $150 million in 1988 and $250 million in 1989 trying to win American "hearts and minds." This is far more than any other foreign country spends. Moreover, unlike the funds spent by Canada and Great Britain and their companies, the Japanese contribution is part of a concerted political and economic strategy.

Some of this money is directed toward what the Japanese call "good corporate citizenship," but much of it is aimed at reinforming the viewpont of the Japanese in the raging American debate over trade and foreign investment. Currently, they are targeting their funds on scholars and think tanks that blame the trade deficit on American fiscal or corporate policies rather than on Japanese trade barriers or state-subsidized export strategies. Not surprisingly, the Japanese have avoided funding proponents of "managed trade" who believe that Japan must agree to specific increases in its imports. "What the Japanese are trying to do is maintain the status quo," says Donald Hellmann, professor at the University of Washington's Jackson School of International Relations.

According to Choate, the Japanese also spend a mimimum of $100 million last year hiring Washington layers and public relations experts. Most of those hired have been what Washingtonians call "Guccis"—$350-an-hour former legislators or government officials like former Republican Cabinet official Elliot Richardson or former Carter White House aide Stuart Eizenstat. Through these prestigious ex-officials, the Japanese expect to influence Congress and the White House policies on trade and investment. Last year, for instance, Japanese companies tried to keep semiconductors and telecommunications equipment off the Administration's list of products that Japan was refusing to import and to block Congressional efforts to fund American consortia in high technology.

There is nothing illegal about Japan's funding of think tanks and academics and hiring lobbyists. Nor is there any evidence that Japan's contributions have led scholars to reverse their positions. Without Japanese funding, policy experts would still be arguing about what causes American trade deficits and whether Japan's investments in the United States are a boon or a bane. But the hundreds of millions that Japan is spending annually are tilting the debate about America's economic future without the public being aware of it. The Japanese are radically reinforcing opinions that mirror their own. "It's like giving certain people a megaphone and forcing everybody else to shout," Choate says.

The money is also creating what the Japanese call "structural corruption"—a kind of systemic bias that does not require conscious acts of corruption but yields much the same results. Government officials in the U.S. Trade Representative's office and the Commerce Department are constantly tempted to allow their negotiating stance to be colored by lucrative future employment possibilities as Japan lobbyists. Two years ago Robert E. Watkins, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce for automotive affairs and consumer goods, resigned after the Associated Press reported that he had sent about 500 letters and résumés to companies including Mazda, Toyota, and Nissan, describing himself as "uniquely qualified to establish and lead an automotive association committed to market principles."

Academics and think tanks are subject to similar temptations. The graduate student in Japan studies worries about who is going to fund his research, and the resident fellow at a think tank, who now has to raise his own salary, worries about how he is going to do so without substantial Japanese contributions. Hellmann says, "If you've got academic institutions and think tanks pandering to where the money is, then you become unable to generate new ideas and policies."

I.

The Japanese are especially interested in think tanks because they play a critical role in Washington, translating academic research into policy recommendations. Think tankers like the Brookings Institution's Robert Lawrence frequently testify in Congressional hearings on U.S.-Japan issues. Think tank reports also carry considerable weight in policy debates. Administration and Congressional critics of the Omnibus Trade Bill relied heavily on an Institute for International Economics study of U.S.-Japan relations. The study, partially funded by the U.S.-Japan Foundation, claimed that a "complete elimination of Japanese trade barriers" would reduce the trade deficit only by $5 billion to $8 billion. "People were always citing the institute's research to show that the trade barriers were minor," says former Commerce Department official Clyde Prestowitz, a leading Japan critic.

The Japanese first approached Washington think tanks in 1972, after President Nixon slapped a ten percent surcharge on imports, but they were initially rebuffed. According to a former Brookings fellow, when Sumitomo Bank offered the Brookings Institution a million-dollar grant that year, then Brookings President Kermit Gordon turned it down because the money came from "a foreign lobby."

In the intervening years, however, Washington's think tanks lost whatever qualms they had about accepting Japanese grants. With the rise of new conservative think tanks such as the American Enterprise Institute (AEI) and the Heritage Foundation and the decline in contributions from large American foundations such as Rockefeller and Ford, Washington's think tanks began to compete aggressively for funding. Most of the major think tanks in Washington, from the liberal Brookings to the conservative AEI and Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS), now gladly accept funding from Japanese firms and foundations. The exceptions are the liberal Economic Policy Institute and the new right Free Congress Foundation, which favor aggressive trade policies: they have neither wooed nor been wooed by the Japanese.

The Japanese funders have sometimes sought immediate returns for their money. When Nomura Securities funded a Brookings-sponsored annual conference on Japan with other think tanks, Brookings officials became upset when Nomura tried to set the agenda. Brookings Senior Fellow Ed Lincoln explains, "The Japanese just don't have the same kind of eleemosynary background in their society, and the first thing they ask when they give money is what do we get."

In the face of this pressure, some think tanks have allowed the Japanese funders unusual kinds of influence. One of the first major Japanese grants after Ronald Reagan's election in 1980 went to CSIS. Housed on six floors of a K Street office cube, CSIS has been a major outlet of conservative foreign policy opinion. It is chaired by former NATO Ambassador David Abshire and still advertises a connection with former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger. It specializes in private briefings for political and business leaders.

In early 1981 CSIS accepted a million-dollar endowment from Toyota to found a chair of Japanese studies, the appointment to which would be for two-year nonrenewable terms. CSIS calls it their "Japan chair," but Japan specialists sometimes refer to it derisively as the "Toyota chair." Unlike universities, which customarily do not allow firms or individuals who endow chairs to have any say over who is appointed to them, CSIS consults Toyota officials about who is appointed. Appointees are also expected to give Toyota officials special briefings when they come to town. Former Treasury official C. Fred Bergsten, the director of the Institute for International Economics, thinks CSIS has gone too far. "To consult with any funder compromises the independence and integrity of an operation based on analytic research," he says.

Brookings, the oldest of the think tanks and traditionally a source of Democratic administration officials, began accepting Japanese grants in the early '70s, but it insisted that Japanese firms donate their money to American foundations like the Japan Society, which then gave grants to Brookings's general fund, where Brookings's administrators parcelled it out. Last fall, however, Brookings accepted a major grant from Japanese business to endow a permanent chair in international economics, named after former Treasury official Robert Roosa. According to Brookings officials, the three funding organizations, the Federation of Tokyo Bankers Association, the Life Insurance Association of Japan and the Japan Securities Dealers Association, will not be consulted on who fills the chair or on the kind of work produced. But Ed Lincoln worries that accepting the gift was a "significant step" for Brookings. "The chair deals with international financial issues, but that is only one step removed from being directly involved with Japan." The pressures raised by such a gift are obvious. If Brookings were to appoint a critic of Japan's trade practices to the new chair, it might have trouble getting further gifts from Japanese companies.

The Committee for Economic Development (CED), a policy group based in Washington and New York, has played an important role in inflencing government fiscal policy. But its ties to Japanese firms and lobbyists raise questions about its intellectual independence in addressing U.S.-Japan issues. Owen Butler, the chairman of CED and a former chairman of Procter & Gamble, now serves as a salaried senior adviser to Daiwa Securities America, the American subsidiary of the Tokyo financial firm. This fall Daiwa donated $1 million to CED for a program named after Butler.

CED produces biannual reports on "United States-Japan Trade Relations" with Keizai Doyukai, the Japan Association of Corporate Executives. The reports themselves are funded by the United States-Japan Foundation, whose money comes from the Japan Shipbuilding Association. The current report could be labeled the "Nissan report." CED chose former U.S. Special Trade Representative William Eberle, the president of a firm that lobbies for Nissan, to chair CED's committee. Keizai Doyukai's committee was chaired by Takashi Ishihara, the chairman of Nissan.

The 1989 report predictably reflected the view being promulgated by Japan and its Washington lobbyists. For instance, it blamed the trade deficit primarily on the U.S. budget deficit, and warned that citing Japan for trade barriers under the bill "could trigger a protectionist spiral." It rejected a "managed trade" strategy favored by some of CED's business members. Such a view by itself is intellectually defensible, but it was intellectually defensible to present this view, as CED did, as the result of the deliberations of independent American and independent Japanese businessmen.

II.

The Japanese heavily fund Japan studies programs as well as think tanks. Chalmers Johnson, a Japan expert at the University of California, San Diego, estimates that Japan funds about three-quarters of university research about Japan. Like the think tanks, the Japan studies programs face the challenge of maintaining an environment of disinterested objectivity while seeking funds from donors very interested in the results of the research. Some of the programs have clearly failed to meet this challenge.

Washington's Reischauer Center for East Asian Studies, which is part of Johns Hopkins's Paul Nitze School for Advanced International Studies, doubles as a think tank and a graduate school. From its building down the street from Brookings, it not only teaches students but also publishes papers and holds conferences for legislators and business leaders. The Reischauer Center has always been unusually dependent on Japanese political and financial support, which has created concern among some academics. Johns Hopkins officials announced the formation of the center in Tokyo in June 1984 at the same time as it awarded Japanese Premier Yasuhiro Nakasone an honorary degree.

The center made Nakasone the honorary chairman of its advisory council, and in 1987 the Japan Shipbuilding Foundation endowed a chair at the center in Nakasone's name. In raising funds, one former faculty member says, the center has "peddled the Nakasone connection." For instance, in the center's promotional film, its director, George Packard, attributes the founding of the Reischauer Center to Nakasone's "extraordinary kindness and encouragement."

According to Packard, the center gets about ten percent of its annual budget, or $300,000, from Japanese sources—a large amount, considering the contribution of student tuitions and the fact that the center also covers China and Southeast Asia. Donors include Japanese government agencies and major Japanese corporations, among them Toyota, Sony, All Nippon Airways, Nomura Securities, and NEC. The chairmen of these corporations and a representative from Japan's Ministry of International Trade and Industry (MITI) have sat on the center's advisory council.

The center's annual reports on U.S.-Japan relations mirror Japanese positions. In the center's 1988 report, which was funded by Equitable Japan and the Nissho Iwai Corporation, it denounced the Omnibus Trade bill, passed with wide Senate and House support and signed by the President, as "protectionist." The center's report also referred to the "alleged dumping" of Japanese semiconductors, even after an official Commerce Department finding that dumping had occurred. (Such an assertion proved too much even for Japanese semiconductor industry lobbyist Stanton Anderson. "Under U.S. dumping laws, dumping occurred," Anderson told me. "Nobody challenged that.")

The Japanese themselves tend to think of the center as a lobby. The Japanese newspaper Asahi Shimbun included an account of the center's activities in a 1985 article titled "The Fifth Branch of the U.S. Government: Lobbyists." Robert Angel, a political scientist at the University of South Carolina, says: "Japanese government and business public relations types seem to interpret the center's appeals for funding as an opportunity to support a public relations platform in Washington."

Packard, a former aide to Ambassador to Japan Edwin O. Reischauer, is both director of the center and dean of the Nitze School. Packard is also a business consultant on salary to KRC Pacific Partners Limited, which advises American and Japanese firms. He writes advertorials for the Japanese Chamber of Commerce in New York. He has served on the board of Telejapan, a Japanese television company that produces what it claims to be independent shows for American television. Former Newsweek reporter Kim Willenson quit the board after learning that officials of MITI were supervising Telejapan. Willenson says that Packard told him he was "making a mountain out of a molehill."

Packard denies that either his own outside connections or the Japanese contributions to the center have any bearing on its teaching or publications. "We are uninfluenced by Japanese money," Packard says. Packard dismisses his academic critics: "In the academic world, there is a bitterness toward those who try to explain Japan's side."

But the center and Packard have what Chalmers Johnson calls a "truth in advertising problem." If the center were billed as a joint operation of Japanese and American businesses, and if Packard were presented on television or in op-ed pieces as a consultant and fund-raiser with links to Japanese companies rather than simply as an academic dean, then the public would not be misled. But when the center and Packard both present themselves solely under the guise of disinterested scholarship, the public is indeed being fooled, and the debate over U.S.-Japan relations is being corrupted.

III

To influence directly the White House and Congress, Japan has assembled a virtual who's who of lobbyists and advisers in Washington. The Japanese have hired more than 110 former government officials. Almost every important ex-trade official works for the Japanese in some capacity. These include three former U.S. trade representatives: Eberle; William Brock, who advises Toyota; and Robert Strauss, who is a senior partner in the law firm Akin, Gump, Strauss, Hauer, and Feld, which lobbies for the Japanese electronics giant Fujitsu, and who, according to a Toyota representative, advises that company.

Most of the top Democratic and Republican Party officials work for the Japanese. Last December, when the Democratic Party was going to choose a chairman, three of its four leading candidates—Ron Brown and former Representatives Jim Jones and Michael Barnes—all represented Japanese firms. Former Democratic chair Charles Manatt represents Japanese firms, and when Hogan and Harston's Frank Fahrenkopf was Republican chair, he helped one of his law firm's Japanese clients gain entrée to the Department of Commerce.

Many lawyers and public relations men who enjoy or have enjoyed high White House connections work for the Japanese. These include former Eisenhower White House aide Robert Gray, former Nixon aides Leonard Garment and Stanton Anderson, former Carter domestic policy chief Eizenstat, and former Reagan and Bush campaign aide James Lake.

Some government officials who become lobbyists reenter government as trade negotiators. The Bush Administration's U.S. Trade Representative, Carla Hills, hired Julius Katz of the public relations firm Hill and Knowlton as her deputy. Hill and Knowlton represents more than 25 foreign firms and government agencies, including Toyota, Hitachi, and the Japan Trade Center. When Katz's appointment was announced, the general manager of Hill and Knowlton circulated a memo in which you could practically hear the spinning of the revolving door. "I thought you might want to write Jules a note of congratulations," the official prompted. "Obviously, he is with us until his confirmation and perhaps he will return after a stint with USTR."

Japan and America's other economic rivals do not condone these sorts of interlocking relationships between their own governments and foreign lobbyists, reasoning that they make it too hard for the government to distinguish between its interests and those of its competitors. In Japan no self-respecting lawyer, let alone former government official, is willing to lobby for an American company. "They would be seen as paid men," one Japanese official remarked. But what is culturally and morally forbidden in Japan is accepted procedure in contemporary Washington. "In Washington," Chalmers Johnson says, "the fix is always in."

This army of lobbyists and advisers furnishes Japanese companies with the troops necessary to win battles in Washington. The Japanese usually know what the Administration plans to do before most Administration members do. Through their lobby and their funding of think tanks, the Japanese have also acquired a virtual monopoly of economic expertise. When House or Senate members want to learn about a complex trade issue, they will almost inevitably fall back on someone who is an adviser to, a lobbyist for, or a recipient of funding from the Japanese. When the House Ways and Means Committee held a retreat in 1986 to discuss trade legislation, journalists Doug Frantz and Catherine Collins recently reported in Selling Out, they invited Strauss and Eberle to brief them.

When a policy organization names a distinguished group of experts to develop a position paper on trade, Japan's lobbyists invariably lead the list. The Council on Foreign Relations appointed a multinational working group last year to develop a paper on "Business and Government in an Interdependent World." The Americans included Eberle and former Deputy Trade Representative William Walker, who also lobbies for Japanese firms.

Through its lobbyists and advisers Japan also has unprecedented clout and access in the White House and Congress. In the Bush White House, Stanton Anderson commands the attention due a friend and a key fundraiser for the 1988 campaign. When Congressional Democrats vote, they are likely to take seriously the recommendation of a former Democratic official who now commands party influence and fund-raising resources. "If you're a Democrat and a protectionist, you run up against Chuck Manatt, Bob Strauss, and Ron Brown," says one lobbyist for a domestic manufacturer. "If you're interested in your career, why bump up against these powerhouses?"

Most of Japan's lobbying feats go unnoticed except by the businesses affected, but there have been some dramatic public successes. In a battle lasting two years, lobbyists got Congress to reduce drastically the sanctions against Toshiba for selling advanced submarine technology to the Soviet Union—a sale that cost the United States an estimated $30 billion to counter. When the Senate first learned of the sale in June 1987, it voted 92-5 to bar Toshiba sales for three years. A year later, after Toshiba had spent $10 million lobbying, the House and Senate finally reached a compromise, limiting the ban to government sales by Toshiba's subsidiary, Toshiba Machine. Instead of costing Toshiba $10 billion, Congress's action cost it several hundred million.

During the same years the lobby also defeated Representative John Bryant's bill that required foreign investors to disclose their holdings in American firms, even though most Western European countries and Japan require even closer scrutiny of foreign investments. After the House narrowly passed the measure, the Japan lobbytists, led by Eizenstat, Richardson, and former USTR General Counsel Richard Rivers from Strauss's law firm, secured its defeat in the Senate by 83-11.

The Japan lobby rarely wins battles on its own. Instead it throws its considerable weight behind one side in a debate. During Bush's first year the lobby mounted a major offensive to prevent the Administration from citing Japan for blocking American sales of semiconductors under the "Super 301" legislation passed by Congress in 1988. Citing these products would have entailed raising a threat of sanctions against Japan if negotiations didn't remove trade barriers.

One lobbyist, who asked not to be identified, described the battle to keep semiconductors off the list as "a war." The Japanese may have spent as much as $5 million lobbying on this issue alone. Stanton Anderson's law firm received $167,000 between April and June alone from the Electronics Industry Association of Japan (EIAJ). William Walker's law firm, Mudge Rose Guthrie Alexander and Ferndon, received $181,000 from the EIAJ during the same period for lobbying White House aides Michael Boskin, Steve Ferrer, and Roger Porter. During the first six months of 1989, Strauss's firm collected $577,585 from Fujitsu. And these were only a few of the law firms and Japanese companies involved.

In the Bush Administration debate over Super 301, the Japan lobby's massive effort tipped the scales in favor of Boskin, Porter, and budget director Richard Darman and against the Commerce Department. When the Bush Administration announced the products that it was citing Japan for, semiconductors were not on the list. "I thought the decision reached by the President was masterful," lobbyist Anderson said. Four months later U.S. Trade Representative Hills announced the United States would no longer pursue the Reagan Administration's demand that Japan import a targeted percentage of American semiconductors.

Recently the Japan lobby has also tried to frustrate attempts by the American electronics industry to develop an American high-definition television industry. As was the case with semiconductors, the lobby has reinforced efforts by a vocal faction within the Administration. At the beginning of September Secretary of Commerce Robert Mosbacher, who had kicked lobbyists Anderson and Walker out of his office in March, threw in the towel. At Anderson's request, Mosbacher held a high-level meeting in Japan with the chairman of NHK, the Japan broadcasting company that is heavily committed to HDTV. During the same visit Mosbacher announced that he no longer favored American Government support for HDTV.

The Japanese are also fighting Congressional attempts to exclude foreign companies from government-funded industrial consortia that are meant to help the United States compete in high technology. Congress has been willing to include companies like Phillips or Thomson that do their research and development in the United States, but it wants to exclude companies that use the United States merely to assemble their products and refuse to allow American companies to join similar consortia. This applies to the Japanese companies. According to Congressional sources, Mitsubishi Electronics, which employs Jim Lake's public relations firm, has been lobbying heavily against the proposals.

In waging these battles, Japan's lobbyists invariably appeal to American support for free markets and free trade, implying that the United States is violating international standards of good capitalist behavior. But in the battles over foreign investment disclosure, semiconductors, and government funding of high-technology consortia, the Japanese are using their lobby to block precisely the kind of trade and industrial strategy that they themselves used to win foreign markets for their consumer electronics industry. Like the proverbial bad parents, the Japanese are saying, "Don't do as we do, do as we tell you."

During the '80s the Japanese developed an even more subtle strategy for influencing Congress and the White House. They got American business that depended upon Japanese companies to pressure Congress and the White House. They tried this first with imported car dealers and, during the mid-'80s, with computer and other high-technology companies that used Japanese components.

During the fierce debate over Toshiba sanctions, computer firms like NCR, Apple, and Hewlett-Packard that used Toshiba disk drives, printers, and other components lobbied Congress against sanctions. Some of the same firms protested the Reagan Administration's semiconductor agreement with Japan and have sought the agreement's repeal. In fighting against government funding of American HDTV efforts, the Japanese have been able to rely on companies like Ampex that now get an important part of their profits from selling Japanese technology. "We've got to the point where we can say, 'We've met the enemy and he is us,'" says Bill Reinsch, an aide to Pennsylvania Senator John Heinz.

The Japanese also use a traditional front group strategy to get their point across. Japanese subsidiaries now play a significant role in the Electronics Industry Association, but in debates with the American Electronics Association, the EIA presents itself as merely a rival American trade association. The EIA first opposed any government HDTV funding whatsoever and then, when that position appeared impolitic, insisted that foreign subsidiaries enjoy the fruits of any government intervention. The EIA's position was not without merit intellectually—its position paper was ably drafted by the Berkeley Roundtable on International Economics—but it lacked candor. What appeared to be a plea for free market principles was also part of a strategy for foreign domination of the American HDTV market.

IV.

Japan's funding of think thanks and universities and its support for a powerful lobby in Washington has created an untenable situation in Washington. The most important questions facing Americans concern our economic future, and some of these revolve around our relationship with Japan and Japanese companies. Our trade with Japan is the single greatest cause of the U.S. trade with Japan is the single greatest cause of the U.S. trade deficit; and Japan has come to dominate precisely those areas of industry upon which our growth and prosperity will rest. The United States has to decide how to respond to what Akio Morita and Shintaro Ishihara in The Japan That Can Say "No" candidly call "economic warfare," but it's hard for Americans to have a meaningful debate when Japan and its lobbyists have acquired such extensive influence over the debate itself.

To put it as simply as possible: the United States must hold discussions among its own citizens before it can hold discussions with Japan. There have to be two separate debates or discussions. Americans first have to decide among themselves what is in their national interest. But the effect of Japan's influence campaign is to make the first debate impossible. When two prominent Americans rise to discuss U.S.-Japan trade relations, there's a good chance one or both is in the pay of the Japanese.

What can be done? The American public must at least be informed when a participant in the discussion of U.S. trade and investment has financial ties with the Japanese. The current means for such disclosure are, however, woefully inadequate.

Lobbyists for foreign companies are supposed to register with the Justice Department's Foreign Agents Registration Office. But the office is hopelessly understaffed—it has only a dozen employees, and has yet to submit its report for 1987—and the regulations themselves are extremely loose. Those who advise foreign companies but do not directly lobby public officials—like Brock or former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisors Martin Feldstein—do not have to register. Nor do lobbyists like Ron Brown who represent American subsidiaries of Japanese companies. This means that the public has no way of knowing that these people have a financial stake in holding certain views about trade and investment issues.

Senator Heinz has introduced a bill that will require publicists or lawyers who represent the Ameican subsidiaries of foreign companies or who represent foreign firms and their subsidiaries in administrative and judicial cases to register with the Justice Department. But Heinz's bill is being fiercely fought by the lobby. Al Yamada, who lobbies for Toyota U.S.A., says, "I think it is unfair. When you register as a foreign agent, you have all kinds of restraints."

Even if Heinz's bill passes, however, it will not cover the case of advisers, think tanks, policy groups, and universities. Here, part of the responsibility for disclosure must rest with the individuals and institutions themselves. When the Council on Foreign Relations publishes its forthcoming report on business-government relations, it should acknowledge that the authors included two prominent Japan lobbyists. And academics like Packard should identify their business interests when appearing in public forums. But when voluntary self-disclosure fails, the responsibility for revealing potential conflicts of interest reverts to the press.

So far the press has not lived up to this responsibility. The classic instance is an October 1986 Washington Post article on the debate over Reagan's semiconductor agreement. The story was headlined, "Former U.S. Official Assails Japanese Pact." It reported that "former Commerce Under Secretary Lionel Olmer" had criticized the agreement in a debate with Alan W. Wolff, "who represented the domestic semiconductor industry."

The story's headline and the identification of the principals gave the reader the impression that a disinterested former official had challenged the opinion of a paid industry lobbyist, but in fact, Olmer was employed at the time the piece appeared as an adviser to Nippon Telephone and Telegraph. Moreover, Wolff, besides representing the semiconductor industry, was himself a former trade official in the Carter Administration. The argument was really between two former trade officials, both of whom had a financial stake in their own positions.

The practice continues unabated. In an October 1989 Washington Post story on Japan, Packard is identified merely as "dean of Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies." In an October column attacking proponents of managed trade, Washington Post reporter Hobart Rowen cites as an authority "Washington attorney William N. Walker," who is in fact a New York attorney who lobbies for the Japanese electronics industry. Readers who assume that Packard or Walker are expressing disinterested opinions are being misled. And the Post is not alone. Of major national publications, only Business Week consistently ferrets out potential conflicts of interest.

Only when the participants are adequately identified can the great debate begin. Should the government try to break down Japanese trade barriers through demanding specific quotas? Should it scrutinize foreign investments? Should the U.S. Government help develop its own HDTV industry? Should it help fund a consortium to develop the next generation of computer chips? Should it establish a new Cabinet department that performs the same kind of functions that Japan's MITI does? America's future rests on the answers to these questions, but they cannot be adequately debated as long as many of the leading participants have an undisclosed financial stake in one answer rather than another.

We should keep the statements from this article in mind now that the Japanese Government is targeting our charities and community organizations—and targeting is the right word.

We have always accepted contributions of money for organizations, because that too, is a way of sustaining the American system. But—and that is a big but—Americans have always carefully examined money with strings attached to it. We all too well know in Congress how carefully we must examine what we do. Well, organizations and charities are just as aware as we are what it means to receive contributions with strings attached.

Now our organizations are about to receive money and volunteers with strings attached by the Japanese Government. According to a New York Times article by David E. Sanger, on February 22 titled, "Japan To Give Tax Benefits For Charitable Aid In U.S." Sanger wrote:

Worried about mounting hostility to Japan's huge investments in the United States, the Japanese Government has offered Japanese companies a large tax deduction if they give money to hospitals, schools and philanthropic activities in the United States, according to Government officials.

Japan has made no formal announcement of the move, but it was discussed at length during a highly unusual meeting of 300 of the country's top business executives, who were summoned by the Foreign Ministry last Friday.

The tax break—effectively a Japanese Government subsidy to American organizations—is the latest and most significant move yet to try to defuse tension with the United States over Japan's growing presence there, which Japan now fears may be poisoning relations between the two countries.

Moreover, the tax deduction for charitable donations seems to be part of a broader effort by the Government and industry to burnish the image of Japanese as solid citizens in the American communities where Japanese companies have built plants. Indeed, the tax breaks are merely one element in the drive to encourage Japanese expatriates working in the United States to integrate more in the activities of the American communities.

The article goes on;

In recent days, for example, the Japanese Chamber of Commerce has begun distributing 5,000 copies of an 85-page handbook containing advice to Japan-based companies in America on how to participate effectively in communities, supporting local charities and volunteering to work for local organizations.

Tsutomu Karino, an executive director, explained that the handbook was issued because the American tradition of volunteerism was not much developed in Japan.

"Most Americans feel this is common sense," Mr. Karino said, "Most Japanese feel this is not common sense, this is unusual."

Published with Japanese and English text on facing pages, the book is entitled, "Joining In! A Handbook for Better Corporate Citizenship in the United States."

The book does urge the Japanese to promote their community efforts. That "It is important in American society to take credit for good works accomplished. This is not bragging, it is a matter of getting deserved credit."

If the Japanese are so concerned about getting deserved credit—then I suggest they pay their fair share of taxes instead of their being so concerned about mixing in our grassroots political and social system where we work out the directions for our communities and our country.

The New York Times carried a story by Robert Pear on February 18: "IRS Investigating Foreign Companies Over Units in U.S." It carried a subtitle: "Low Tax Payments Cited—Officials Say the Prices Used for Internal Transactions Cut Taxes $12 Billion." Pear wrote:

Bolstered by new auditing powers, Federal tax officials are investigating many American subsidiaries of Japanese companies on the suspicion that they have underpaid corporate income taxes by billions of dollars.

As foreign-owned assets in the United States more than tripled in a decade to $1.8 trillion, the gross income foreign-owned companies made here more than doubled. But the total taxes they paid hardly changed, data compiled by the Internal Revenue Service show. Of the 36,800 foreign-owned companies filing returns in 1986, more than half reported no taxable income.

Tax officials assert that some subsidiaries understate income, thus minimizing tax liability, by manipulating transactions with parent companies. But the IRS has been frustrated in an effort to audit these companies' returns because important financial records are often kept at headquarters abroad in foreign languages, with much less detail than would be required in the United States.

How this is done was explained:

Federal tax officials say American distributors of foreign-made goods can reduce their profits, and thus their tax liability, by paying high prices to the parent corporations for goods, services and technology.

Under U.S. Federal law, a parent company is supposed to charge its subsidiary the same price as a buyer would pay an unrelated seller in the open market—the "arm's length" price.

Cited as an example was the American subsidiary of Yamaha Motor Co. who understated its income and overstated what it paid to its parent company. Yamaha is now in court for an alleged underpayment of $133 million in taxes, plus $13 million in penalties.

The article explained that Toyota is fighting giving documents to the IRS for charging American distributors more than it does their Japanese distributors.

Of course they are concerned about their image and with underpaying their taxes, so they now propose to channel some of this money to our charities and organizations. I mention this, because the charity giving is one thing—but the working in an American community with the Japanese goals in mind—and that is what it is if the government is directing and coordinating them—is another.

The pattern of targeting that Marvin Wolf pointed out in the "Japanese Conspiracy" is being repeated. They are coordinating with the government. The system of interlocking businesses is functioning.

Now we have an infusion of Japanese small businesses setting up in the San Diego area, according to the Wall Street Journal on February 23. They are investing and "serving large Japanese corporations already in the San Diego area."

In Kentucky in the past six months alone, five foreign toolmakers have started operations to supply Toyota's auto factory in Georgetown.

Now, are we to have our social and political life inordinately influenced by the Japanese as Mr. Judis pointed out in the New Republic? It is not in our best interest.

The best explanation comes in a review of the book "Democracy and Its Critics" by Robert A. Dahl. In his review, Robert Bellah wrote:

In an advanced democratic country the economic order would be understood as instrumental not merely to the production and distribution of goods and services but to a much larger range of values, including democratic values. The economic order would be seen as intended to serve not merely consumers but human beings in all the activities to which an economic order may contribute.

Mr. Dahl believes we are on "the threshold of a third democratic transformation involving a significant increase in citizen participation in our economic and political life."

This cannot be done through reverse "Ugly Americanism." It must be done by our citizens.

That citizen participation must come from those who are American citizens, who vote in our elections and accept all the obligations that citizenship carries with it. Expatriates may like us—may love us—may understand us—but they are not the citizens who are responsible to uphold this great country.

Paying taxes is one way to uphold that responsibility—working in our organizations—and voting. The Japanese meet none of these criteria.

This country is filled with creative, friendly people. When challenged, we will respond. We know what it means when we sing "America The Beautiful" or we hear the "Star Spangled Banner." The vision of freedom and opportunity runs through our mind and our spirits lift. We cannot pervert and must not pervert this for an economic gain by another country. We are free and must remain free, economically and spiritually. I know Americans will rise to meet this challenge. I am.

CRITICISMS OF PRESIDENT'S PROPOSED HIGHER EDUCATION BUDGET, FISCAL YEAR 1991

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLARKE). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAYDOS] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, I am very disappointed with the administration's proposed higher education budget for fiscal year 1991 for two reasons. First, the funding is extremely inadequate, meaning that fewer students will be assisted; and second, many of those students who will be assisted will receive less money, especially at a time when college costs are rising faster than the inflation rate.

I somehow expected more than a trite, all-too familiar package that provides less for our Nation's post-secondary students, especially from our self-proclaimed "Education President."

I'm surprised the President even submitted this proposal as it is, because it contains exactly the same elements that caused him to veto the 1990 appropriations bill last October. Namely, it "underfunds the Pell Grant Program, weakening the Nation's commitment to expanding opportunity for higher education."

A recent article in the Wall Street Journal reported that "College tuition looks likely to leap past inflation for the 10th year in a row." While inflation is expected to be about 4 percent, tuitions for the 1990-91 school year may rise as much as 11 percent.

And, despite the fact that student aid programs have not even kept pace with inflation, our "Education President" is requesting $486.7 million less in the student aid for fiscal year 1991 than Congress appropriated for fiscal year 1990. This reduction in funds means that 74,000 fewer students in the 1990-91 school year will be served as compared to the number served in the 1989-90 cycle.

How this administration can imply it is committed to expanding educational opportunities is beyond me.

To me, the proposed budget shows more of a commitment to stifling opportunities for four main reasons: First, it underfunds the Pell Grant Program; second, it completely eliminates four other student aid programs; third, it provides no Federal funds for two student aid programs without actually doing-away with them; and fourth, it substantially reduces funds for two other aid programs.

No. 1—the Pell Grant Program, the Department of Education's most need-focused student aid program, is underfunded in three ways.

First, while there is an apparent increase of $473 million—$371 million of that will go to cover the previous year shortfalls and we lose an additional $218 million unless we pass a package of cost-reduction measures the Department of Education plans to propose.

Second, the maximum Pell grant is still set at $2,300. This is the same level as the 1989-90 academic year even though tuition costs are rising. This means for the 1990-91 cycle, the value of each grant will decrease by about 9 percent, making the awards going to those students who need the assistance the most worth even less than ever before.

And third, the administration did not request a supplemental appropriation to restore $66.5 million sequestered from the Pell program for fiscal year 1990, meaning 14,000 students will be dropped from the program for the 1990-91 academic year, and 1.3 million of the 3.2 million grant recipients—more than a third of those served—will receive awards reduced by an average of $50.

No. 2, the administration proposes to completely cut four programs—Cooperative Education, Law School Clinical Experience, Veterans' Education Outreach, and Innovative Projects for Community Service. For fiscal 1990, Congress appropriated a total of $22.6 million for them.

These programs provided a wide range of opportunities for students, ranging from work experience to tutoring and counseling services for veterans to helping students reduce their acquired debt by participating in community service projects.

No. 3, the administration selected two programs to receive no Federal funds for fiscal year 1991—the State student incentive grants and the Perkins loan programs.

Last fiscal year, Congress appropriated $59.2 million for the State Student Incentive Grants Program and that money assisted 197,000 students.

The administration wants no Federal money to go to this program for fiscal year 1991 because it believes "Federal funds are no longer necessary" because State expenditures for grant aid have continued to expand in recent years. It also believes the "Work-Study program provides more than adequate Federal incentives for the creation of part-time community service employment opportunities for needy students."

I have a problem with this for two reasons.

First, most Americans who qualify to receive grant money already have to work while they attend school to come up with the expected contribution toward their education. If we accept this proposal by the administration, these students will have to spend even more time working instead of studying if they want to further their education.

Second, I don't understand how the administration expects these 197,000 students to be miraculously absorbed into the Work-Study Program. The administration is not requesting any more money for work-study than it did for the 1989-90 school year, so the program will have to assist 5,000 fewer students in 1990-91 than it is today, not counting the other 197,000 that received SSIG funds.

The other program the administration wants to cut off from all Federal funding for fiscal year 1991 is the Perkins Loan Program. The program can still operate for the 1990-91 school year without Federal support by using the money collected from previous loans to fund new loans, but 108,900 fewer students will be assisted without this important Federal support.

The administration says that it is not appropriating money for the Perkins Loan Program for fiscal year 1991 because the loans "provide heavy and unnecessary Federal interest subsidization."

The administration says this action does not represent a policy shift but that is exactly what it is—and, it seems to me, a much misinformed one, since the burden of subsidizing the Stafford loans is much greater.

And, No. 4, the administration has targeted two programs to receive less money in fiscal year 1991 than Congress had appropriated in fiscal year 1990—the guaranteed student loans, and the college housing and academic facilities programs.

The administration has proposed that the guaranteed student loans programs receive $459 million less in fiscal year 1991. If the Congress goes along, 9,000 fewer students will be assisted during the 1990-91 academic year than during the 1989-90 year.

Although there is an overall anticipated drop in the number of students served in the three guaranteed student loan programs—the Stafford loan, formerly the guaranteed student loan, which lends money to students based on need; the Parent Loan for Undergraduate Students [PLUS], which lends supplemental money to students' parents; and the Supplemental Loan for Students [SLS] which lends additional money primarily to independent students, the Department of Education expects the number of PLUS loans will increase by 34,000. One reason for the increase, according to the Department, is because students are hitting the maximum awards and need even more money than they needed in the past to finance their education.

The $3.3683 billion proposed for all three of the guaranteed student loan programs sounds like a lot of money, and it is, but the amount is more than a little misleading since not all of it goes to students in the form of loans. The largest cost of these programs is the interest subsidies and special allowances paid in the Stafford Loan Program. Close to $1.7 billion—almost half of the total amount requested for all three programs—is targeted for interest subsidies and special allowances.

And even this may not be an accurate figure since the Department's estimate of what it will need is based on the expectation that the interest rate of the Treasury bill decrease. If the rate does not decrease, it may cost closer to $2.4 billion, or over 71 percent of the total requested for the three programs, to pay the interest subsidies and special allowances.

The other program the administration targeted to reduce funds for is the College Housing and Academic Facilities Loans Program.

The administration wants to reduce funds to this program from $30 million to $5 million—a reduction of $25 million—because the administration believes these loans do not carry out an appropriate Federal role since they are not tied to national priorities. Even though the President has targeted education as a national priority, I guess he isn't concerned about whether there are enough classrooms to teach the students or enough dorms to house them.

Which programs are targeted or not targeted as national priorities has a direct impact on what I call the seesaw policy.

The administration's proposal targets science, mathematics, and engineering as priority programs. To encourage students to enroll in them, the administration has earmarked more money to support those programs and the students who do enroll in them.

It sounds easy enough doesn't it? But who gets hurt?

For fiscal 1991, the administration is proposing to seriously cut funds that support programs such as the arts, humanities, social sciences, and programs that encourage careers in public service because the administration does not consider these national priorities right now. To demonstrate what is really going on here, let's look at what the administration wants to do with the fellowship and scholarship programs.

Last fiscal year, Congress appropriated and earmarked a total of $11.2 million to support two fellowship programs that encourage students to enroll in arts and humanities programs, namely, the Jacob K. Javits Fellowship, and the Patricia Roberts Harris Public Service Fellowship programs.

The administration's proposal not only calls for reducing the amount of money these programs will receive for the 1990-91 academic year, but also puts them on a track to be completely eliminated.

The administration wants to reduce the amount of money the Jacob K. Javits Fellowship Program will receive for fiscal year 1991 from $7.9 million to $5.4 million—a reduction of about 30 percent. These fellowships are targeted to be phased out over a 3-year period because the administration feels the program does not support study in areas of high national priority.

The administration also plans to reduce the amount of money the Patricia Roberts Harris Public Service Fellowship Program will receive from $3.3 million to $1.2 million—a reduction of $2.1 million. These need-based fellowships are targeted to be phased out because the administration says it sees no shortages in public service.

Don't you think common sense would tell a person that by cutting these two fellowship programs and not encouraging students to pursue careers in the arts or humanities, we will create shortages in these areas?

I guess it's something our "Education President" doesn't want to think aobut right now because, for now, national priorities are mathematics, science, and engineering.

Last fiscal year, Congress appropriated $15.8 million for a program called Graduate Assistance in Areas of National Need. That's $4.6 million more than we appropriated for the two fellowship programs the administration proposes to eliminate.

The Graduate Assistance in Areas of National Need Program provides fellowships to graduate students in areas of national need as determined by the Secretary of Education in conjunction with the National Science Foundation, the National Academy of Sciences, the National Endowment for the Arts and Humanities, and other Federal and nonprofit agencies and organizations.

For fiscal year 1991, the administration plans to increase funding for this program to $25.5 million—an increase of $9.7 million over fiscal year 1990 appropriations.

But that's not all.

The administration also wants to create a new program called National Science Scholars and fund it for $5 million during the 1990-91 academic year and increase funding to $20 million a year by fiscal year 1994.

This new program would provide scholarships for students graduating from high school to enroll in mathematics, science, and engineering programs at the post-secondary level.

If the administration's fiscal year 1991 proposal is accepted as it is, the balance board of the seesaw will be tilting considerably with $30.5 million for mathematics, science, and engineering on one end and $6.6 million for the arts and humanities on the other end. Unfortunately the arts and humanities are quickly slipping off their end of the board because, if you remember, the two programs supporting them are on the track for elimination.

What happens when they finally are eliminated and we realize we will soon have a shortage of students graduating from these types of programs? And, believe me, it will happen—our Nation's educational history is proof of that.

We'll say the arts and humanities should be a national priority, of course. Then we'll take money away from programs not considered to be national priorities at that time, probably mathematics, science, and engineering, and spend those funds to encourage students to pursue study along the lines of our latest national priority. Sound familiar?

The ironic part is that while we're patting ourselves on the back for stopping a virtual disaster once again, the process will start all over again because we will have underfunded other programs to satisfy our new short-term goals.

We are not gaining any ground by following this unwritten policy. We're simply seesawing back and forth according to what is and is not a national priority at a particular point in time.

This way of funding higher education has never worked in the past and it doesn't matter how long we continue trying to make it work. It never will.

Maybe if we have enough faith in the diversity of interest and ability among our student population and make higher education accessible and affordable for all of our students, the diversity of the students themselves might take care of any potential shortages in particular areas. But we can never know if we don't give our students the resources they need to pursue the education of their choice.

When it comes right down to it, the students are the ones who ultimately suffer while we carry on with this extremely inane and destructive tradition. Too many of our country's brightest students are being forced to choose their programs of study based on how much financial aid is available instead of being able to study what interests them most.

I'd like to see the day when we can rest assured that we have approved an education budget that would enable any American who wants to pursue higher education to study the program of his or her choice without having to look at the price tag attached to that program. But, frankly, it won't happen this year because this proposal from our "Education President" falls far short of that mark.

This proposed budget shows no commitment to expanding higher educational opportunities and entrenches us deeper in an all too familiar pattern of underfunding programs and reducing the amount of financial aid going to our students. If the President keeps going at this rate, his desire to be the "Education President" may become nothing more than an unfunny and very cruel joke played on our Nation's students.

I, for one, am not laughing.

ACT TO CREATE IMITATION SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES OUGHT TO BE REPEALED

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARRIS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor of the House today to discuss the decision yesterday of the D.C. City Council to proceed with the election of shadow Senators and Representatives to lobby Congress for statehood.

First, the provision establishing these offices conflicts with the D.C. Home Rule Act which provides for WALTER FAUNTROY the current delegate's presence in Congress, it is in opposition to other congressional enactments, and is in addition, simply unnecessary and ill-advised. It may also conflict with the original voter initiative and referendum which called for the selection of these shadow Senators and Representatives.

Second, while the bill contains little or no funds at present, that is not likely to remain the case over the long run. The fact is that the bill has potentially very high and unnecessary costs for the District of Columbia, for the Congress and, indirectly, the Nation's taxpayers.

Third, it is not a citizen lobby which is constitutionally protected. It is, rather, an employment and involvement opportunity for self-styled activists who have not yet run and apparently have no desire to offer themselves for positions of real responsibility.

THE POSITION IS UNNECESSARY AND CREATES CONFLICT AND CONFUSION

The proponents of statehood say that these shadow congressional officials are needed to help lobby the statehood bill through Congress and to provide an increased form and level of congressional representation for the residents of the District of Columbia.

The District of Columbia, however, already has a representative in Congress to lobby for its interests including statehood. Whether that Representative, the nonvoting Delegate, is effective or not is for the citizens to once again decide on election day in November. If the citizens want a Delegate to spend full-time seeking support for statehood, they can and should elect a Delegate pledged to that proposition. They will have that opportunity. They have it every 2 years.

That is, in fact, consistent with the American election process and is the current law of the land. But establishing shadow congressional officials is not the way to do it. These shadow officials will not have the access to the Members of the Congress which the Delegate now possesses. They will, however, create inevitable conflicts on the questions of where the city stands on any number of issues and they will surely sow confusion as to who rightfully exercises the representational privilege.

Congress had provided the current nonvoting Delegate with all of the resources, including full financial resources as well as the rights and privileges of the House, its committees and its floor. The nonvoting Delegate also has the privileges of the floor in the Senate if he chooses to avail himself of it.

Congress has the obligation to protect the office, if not the individuals in it, and ought not be confronted by an ill-considered proposition which will further denigrate the authority of that position. I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that as an interesting aside the constitution which would be supported by these shadow Senators and Representatives is not the one approved by the voters. Despite what one may think of the previous constitution, that was the one approved by over 70 percent of the citizens of this city in a public referendum.

Unfortunately, that constitution which was admittedly far-reaching and perhaps even unique, was discarded by the city's political leaders who then simply rewrote and substituted their own version of what they thought was a desirable constitution for the District of Columbia, which reflects their individual judgments and values.

Perhaps it is a more politically acceptable document. The citizens, however, ought to have the opportunity, even if they do not have the legal right, to approve or disapprove the current constitution prior to the election of representatives who are purportedly advocating this new approved version on their behalf and in their best interests. That was the position taken by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAZZOLI], one of the members of the committee, at the time the statehood bill was considered in the committee. It was a good position then, and it is a good position now. The new constitution ought to be required to survive a new public forum before creating these shadow offices. Unfortunately and obviously, that is not to be the case in this matter. I would argue that the reason the supporters of that position will not provide an opportunity for the people to vote on this document is that it would most probably fail, and that alternative is simply not acceptable to the proponents. A bad idea cannot be made into a good idea merely because it will now be low cost or even ostensibly and arguably free. Even if the shadow members were to serve without appropriated resources, these would still be official positions bearing the imprimatur of the city government and by implication, of the Federal Government. It seems to me that if there are to be lobbyists for statehood for the District of Columbia, they should be men and women without a government portfolio. They should be citizen lobbyists. This not what was done, and indeed, I predict there will be requests for funds, at least for citizens that will come upon Members, sooner rather than later.

A motion before the city council considered in its session yesterday which would have prohibited public funding of these offices was defeated, and the question of providing from $1 to $3 million to appropriate each of these offices was merely deferred to adoption of the city's budget, a document that will contain authorization for some $3.2 billion.

The most distressing aspect of this entire effort may well center on the fact that it is not a citizen's lobby which is and ought to be constitutionally protected. A true citizen's lobby would have credibility. A citizen's lobby would raise the funds, organize a selection process, and pay the bills which the selected lobbyists incurred on their behalf. They would not have sought Federal funds. Neither would they have sought Federal or local approval in a mock election. They would have wanted only the support and approval of those individuals who committed themselves, their funds, and their efforts to the cause. They would have done it the old-fashioned way, with hard work, diligence, dedication, and care. Instead of that, we see this effort to utilize public imprimatur of the government of the city of the District of Columbia, and of the Federal Government, in an attempt to influence this Congress, which has laws that prohibit the use of public funds for that purpose.

While I have said it before, I think it is worth repeating. The questions of statehood, congressional representation, and greater levels of home rule are serious issues, not only to the District of Columbia but to the Nation as a whole. They should not be taken lightly. They are not the private preserves of a few self-styled activists who may or may not be representating anyone except themselves and their sympathizers. Instead of posturing and threatening to withhold taxes in considering how to make a bad idea palatable, perhaps some efforts should be considered for solutions to the problems which confront the citizens who live in our Nation's Capital. The problems are many, and they are difficult, and at recent times they have been most serious. So, too, are the solutions. If we will remove our blinders and set aside our differences and our ideology, perhaps even we can find an acceptable solution to many of those problems.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and exend their remarks and include therein extraneous material on the special order about to be taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLARKE). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from American Samoa.

There was no objection.

DEVASTATION IN AMERICAN AND WESTERN SAMOA IN THE WAKE OF HURRICANE OFA

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLARKE). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from American Samoa [Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA. Mr. Speaker, I have returned recently from my home district, American Samoa, after spending weeks there assisting with early relief efforts in the wake of Hurricane Ofa. Many of our colleagues, as well as much of the Nation, however, may not be aware that a catastrophe spawned by the forces of nature has wreaked havoc in the countries of the South Pacific. Unlike the extensive media coverage given to our friends in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and the Carolinas in the aftermath of Hurricane Hugo, little attention has been given by the national press to the destructive legacy of Hurricane Ofa.

On the evening of Friday, February 2, Hurricane Ofa ripped through American and Western Samoa with high seas, heavy rains, and winds in excess of 165 mph. When the storm finally subsided, days later on Monday, February 5, a path of widespread destruction and rubble was left behind in both Samoas. Although residents of the islands received limited warnings about the storm developing to the northwest, most were led to believe that the brunt of the hurricane would pass by with, at most, high winds resulting. The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration [NOAA] weather station in American Samoa, relying on weather updates from Fiji and Hawaii, was incapacitated during parts of the hurricane. Consequently, few in the public were prepared for the savage ferocity and extended duration of Hurricane Ofa.

In American Samoa, hundreds of families, with women, children and the elderly, huddled on floors when the howling storm descended on their homes. For many, as reported by a housewife with a 2-month-old infant in Tafuna Village, the roofs of their homes simply exploded, with their life's possessions being scattered to the winds. Upon running to neighbors for shelter and safety, before the traumatized mother could even settle in, their neighbors' houses would also have their roofs ripped off by the gale force winds. For those residents living by the seashore, huge wind-driven waves erupted over beaches and simply swallowed up homes. Entire villages by the coastline, such as Onenoa and Aoa, were engulfed by high seas with virtually all homes destroyed, agriculture lost and possessions swept out to sea.

With preliminary estimates indicating that over 3,700 homes incurred damage from Hurricane Ofa, with almost 600 homes destroyed or rendered uninhabitable, thousands of residents were left homeless. Many have taken refuge at public buildings offering emergency shelter or with relatives.

Fortunately, no fatalities were reported, although hundreds required immediate medical treatment. Several people were hospitalized for serious injuries.

The agricultural crops on the main island of Tutuila, a vital and important food source for all of American Samoa, were decimated. With high velocity winds stripping trees bare, 95 percent of all crops were ravaged.

Damage to American Samoa's infrastructure was also extensive. The hurricane knocked out all electric and water systems islandwide for days. Telecommunication systems were disrupted. Due to wave erosion and felled trees, major roads incurred damage and were rendered impassable. Schools and many businesses, sustaining injury and lacking power, were shutdown. The total damage to American Samoa's infrastructure has been estimated to be well in excess of $25 million.

Upon being notified of Hurricane Ofa hitting American Samoa, I was on the next available flight to the territory and arrived on Tuesday, February 6, a day after the hurricane subsided. On that date, Gov. Peter T. Coleman, after conducting a preliminary assessment of damages to the territory, requested of President Bush that American Samoa be declared a major disaster area.

Although I had received prior reports of the extent of damage to American Samoa, it still came as a great shock to see first hand the level of devastation to Samoa. After briefings with Governor Coleman, Lt. Gov. Galeai Poumele, our legislative leaders, and members of both the Senate and House, Cabinet officials and representatives from the Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA] on-island, I have nothing but the highest praise for the manner in which the local government responded to the crisis. Governor Coleman and Lieutenant Governor Poumele are to be commended for their quick action and decisive judgment in initiating recovery efforts and pursuing Federal assistance on behalf of our people.

Shortly after my arrival in Samoa, I contacted a long-trusted friend of the Samoan people, Hawaii Senator DANIEL INOUYE, House Speaker TOM FOLEY, Majority Leader RICHARD GEPHARDT and Majority Whip WILLIAM GRAY to solicit their assistance in expediting the President's declaration of disaster relief. Mr. Sichan Siv and Mr. Fred McClure of the administration were also contacted for their help and played an instrumental role. I give my heartfelt thanks to each of these honorable public servants that so graciously gave of their time and effort to respond in Samoa's time of need.

On February 9, 3 days after Governor Coleman's request, President Bush notified my office of his decision to declare the territory of American Samoa to be a major disaster area under Public Law 93-288, as amended by Public Law 100-707. In doing so, the President directed FEMA to provide individual and public disaster assistance in accordance with the law. I thank the President for his quick action to assist the only U.S. territory south of the Equator.

Upon notification of the presidential declaration, FEMA swung into action by quickly establishing a disaster field office in Pago Pago. I have been very impressed by the FEMA officials coordinating the Samoa disaster relief operation, especially with reference to Mr. Tommie Hamner FEMA's regional representative.

They arrived immediately after Hurricane Ofa hit the territory and have been very conscientious in laying the groundwork to assist the people of Samoa, well in advance of the President's official declaration approving disaster relief.

With 44 FEMA personnel on-island, they have set up four disaster application centers on Tutuila Island. Over 3,300 applications for Federal assistance programs are being processed at this very moment—ranging from requests for emergency funds to procure temporary rental housing or to make essential housing repairs, to grants for serious disaster related needs, to low-interest SBA loans for rebuilding devastated homes and businesses. From all indications, FEMA is taking pains to process requests for assistance as rapidly as possible.

FEMA has also been supervising and coordinating the disaster recovery efforts of several other organizations. In particular, the American Red Cross has been very generous in addressing the need for emergency food, clothing, and temporary shelter. As of last week, they have processed over 1,500 separate requests for emergency assistance, many for food. In addition, the Red Cross has been distributing hundreds of tents obtained by FEMA to families whose homes were demolished. Wherever disaster strikes throughout the world, the Red Cross has always been there. They have certainly made their presence felt in American Samoa, and their indispensible contribution is much appreciated.

Within a couple of days of Hurricane Ofa breaking, the U.S. military, Cincpac, sent a task force of soldiers to American Samoa to aid our local utility authority in getting power and water services restored. Accompanying the soldiers were several 60 and 5 kilowatt generators to provide portable emergency power. Working in conjunction with the American Samoa Power Authority [ASPA], the military task force played an integral role in efforts to reestablish the supply of drinking water, electricity, and sewage services to the territory. On February 12, a detachment of 32 Navy Seabees, electrical specialists with support equipment, arrived in American Samoa to further assist in the mission to restore power islandwide. The Seabees have been going house to house in the remote areas of the north shore to repair electrical lines. Mr. Speaker, I want to personally commend our civilian aide to the Secretary of the Army, high talking Chief Fuga Tolani Teleso, for his outstanding contributions and tremendous assistance in coordinating our military assistance programs with local government officials.

With the hardworking people of ASPA manning emergency shifts around the clock, and with the invaluable assistance provided by Cincpac, I am happy to report that clean drinking water is now available to all residents with power restored to 75 percent of American Samoa. I thank the U.S. military and ASPA for a job well done. Within a short time, we can look forward to complete provision in the territory of these basic yet vital necessities of civilization.

One last agency that has played a pivotal role in the recovery operation has been American Samoa's Army Reserve. Working under FEMA supervision, the 50-man unit since activation has been distributing and installing plastic tarps on homes suffering from roof damage. The Army Reserve unit has been servicing hundreds of damaged residences and is moving village to village with the repair project. Those with gaping holes in their roofs have been very grateful for the temporary protection afforded their belongings from the elements. Our reservists are to be commended for the fine job they are doing. In addition, the commanding officer of B Company, 100th Battalion, 442d Infantry, First Lieutenant Keomalu, certainly ought to be commended for his leadership of the soldiers under his command. I also want to commend Lt. Gen. Claude Kicklighter, commanding general of Westcom; Brig. Gen. Paul Lister of the IX Corps; and Lt. Comdr. Robert Lee, commanding officer of the 100th Battalion, 442d Infantry, stationed at Fort Derussy, for their invaluable assistance.

Mr. Speaker, recovering from a major disaster the magnitude of Hurricane Ofa is a long and arduous task. American Samoa is still reeling from the devastation caused by Hurricane Tusi a few years back. However, after personally inspecting most of the villages ravaged by Hurricane Ofa and watching the people busy in their repairs, I have been deeply touched by the courage and high spirits shown by the Samoan people in the face of adversity. We have lived through hurricanes, cyclones, tidal waves and other forces of nature before, and while it will be difficult, I am confident our people will once again face the challenge of rebuilding their lives with courage and determination.

Mr. Speaker, although a good portion of the damage caused by Hurricane Ofa to American Samoa's public facilities will be covered by our local government's insurance, it is certain that not all costs will be reimbursed. Moreover, much of the extensive damage to private property will be borne by our citizens, despite FEMA's assistance. American Samoa needs the support and help of our colleagues to get back on its feet. On a related matter, to safeguard against a hurricane of Ofa's intensity arriving unexpectedly again, we definitely need expansion of an up-to-the-minute weather service in the territory. It is my intention to conduct an in-depth review of our current weather reporting system, as there is definitely a need for improvement. I say this, however, without casting any doubt upon the tremendous efforts put forth by our local manager and staff before, during and after Hurricane Ofa struck the territory with such terrible force.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs, I also traveled to our neighboring country, the independent state of Western Samoa, to assess the impact of Hurricane Ofa on the people of Western Samoa. Western Samoa lies but 40 miles away from the territory of American Samoa. The people of the two Samoas share a common culture, language, and way of life.

After meeting with Prime Minister Tofilau Eti Alesana and his cabinet about the state of emergency, I surveyed the countryside from a U.S. Army Blackhawk helicopter engaged in search and rescue missions. In witnessing the widespread devastation caused by Hurricane Ofa, especially on the island of Savaii, it was sobering to realize that Western Samoa was much harder hit than the territory.

Whereas 95 percent of Western Samoa's people live in coastal areas, entire chains of villages were flattened by the phenomenally destructive heavy seas whipped up by winds exceeding 165 mph. Preliminary estimates hold that up to 25,000 residents of Savaii and Upolu Islands have been rendered homeless. Hurricane-related fatalities numbered over 12, 2 weeks ago, and are expected to climb when more complete reports are received from outlying areas. Many have required immediate medical attention, with several people being hospitalized for serious injuries.

Western Samoa's infrastructure was severely impacted. Although 3 weeks have passed since Hurricane Ofa ravaged the country, power and water services have still not been restored to much of Apia, the nation's capital. Folks in the countryside are faring less well. Approximately 80 percent of Western Samoa's telecommunication systems are not functioning. Many of the country's hospitals were damaged and are shutdown. The central wharf and harbor port facilities in Apia sustained damage. The interisland ferries incurred major damage, with one vessel being left stranded on landfill by the heavy seas and high winds.

Much of the road systems on the northwest side of Western Samoa's islands have been destroyed. Roads in other areas, however, have been cleared of debris and temporarily repaired, allowing use by the public.

Of particular concern to this agrarian nation is the devastating toll Hurricane Ofa took on the crops. As occurred in American Samoa, much of the crops were destroyed. Since the breadfruit, banana, and taro crops are staple foods that constitute the foundation of the Samoan diet, dire food shortages have been predicted. With no crops to feed themselves, 80 percent of Western Samoa's 180,000 people are expected to rely on the government for emergency food. Faced with the prospect of feeding its populace for the next 7 months and destruction of basic infrastructure concerns, the Government of Western Samoa faces a potential need for approximately $150 million, which is several times its total annual budget. Media sources in the South Pacific report that Western Samoa has only about 2 week's supply of food left.

The United States, upon learning of the hurricane, was one of the first countries to provide disaster relief assistance to Western Samoa. The United States Ambassador to New Zealand and Western Samoa, Della M. Newman, declared on February 6 that a disaster existed in Western Samoa. Stationed at the Embassy in Apia, U.S. Charge D'Affaires William P. Francisco played a central role in collecting, coordinating, and routing information to the State Department for disaster relief purposes. Both diplomatic officers are to be commended for their quick action in facilitating a timely U.S. response to Hurricane Ofa.

On February 6, the first United States supply of tools and building materials were delivered to Peace Corps volunteers in Western Samoa to aid in their reconstruction projects. A second supply of building materials was delivered days later. Utilizing the supplies, the 53 hardworking Peace Corps volunteers have contributed much to Western Samoa's recovery effort.

On February 8, the weather finally broke, permitting the huge C-5A Galaxy aircraft sent by the U.S. military, Cincpac, to land in Western Samoa. On board was a 57-member joint task force, with two Blackhawk helicopters, a power generator, and assorted support equipment. The task force, utilizing the Blackhawks, conducted several search and rescue missions for missing persons in addition to medivacing sick Samoans. Besides delivering emergency food and medicine to inaccessible areas, the task force also opened up the first communication line to the outside world after Hurricane Ofa's devastation. The task force further assisted in road rebuilding operations and other aspects of repair to the infrastructure.

The State Department also purchased $50,000 worth of food, which was shipped to Western Samoa for emergency purposes. An additional $35,000 has been committed by the State Department for funding necessary disaster relief assistance as the need arises.

The total amount of disaster assistance contributed by the United States to Western Samoa stands at a little over $1 million. Even when combined with the disaster relief contributions from New Zealand, Australia, Japan, the United Kingdom, and France, however it is clear that Western Samoa's damage assessment of $150 million far outstrips the international resources made available for her recovery.

Mr. Speaker, our Nation has a tradition of generosity when responding to disasters abroad. I sincerely hope that our colleagues in the House will continue to extend the hand of support to Western Samoa, the oldest independent democracy in the South Pacific, in this her time of greatest need.

Mr. Speaker, I would be remiss if I did not mention certain individuals who contributed significantly to providing assistance to Hurricane Ofa. First and foremost, Adm. Huntington Hardisty, CINCPAC commander of our Armed Forces throughout Asia and the Pacific; Lt. Gen. Claude Kicklighter, commanding general of U.S. Army Western Command; Col. John Castleberry, officer in charge of military task force assigned to provide assistance to the residents of both American and Western Samoa; Lt. Col. Francis Maronski, deputy officer; Col. Wendell Wong, U.S. Air Force CINCPAC liaison officer; Maj. George Corley, Maj. William Walsh, and Cmd. Sgt. Maj. Felomino Malate.

Mr. Speaker, I submit the list of our military personnel who participated in the recovery program also to be made part of the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend our Governor and members of his cabinet for their quick responses to this emergency. Additionally, I want to commend our President of the Senate, Paramount Chief Letuli Toloa, Speaker of the House, High Chief Tuana'itau Tuia, and all of our Senators and Representatives in the Legislature.

In particular, I commend Lt. Governor Galea'i Poumele for his leadership as head of our territorial task force to address the problems caused by Hurricane Ofa.

Mr. Speaker, hopefully in the near future there will be a final report to be submitted both from our local government and FEMA to determine exactly what our needs will be—and then at that time I will inform my colleagues and the Congress for possible options and solutions to those needs.

Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased with the support I have received from our colleagues in the House. And I want to especially commend my distinguished chairman of the House Interior Committee, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL]. Also, Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Asia and Pacific, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ]. Also our chairman of the House Interior Subcommittee on International and Insular Affairs, the gentleman from the U.S. Virgin Islands [Mr. DE LUGO]. Also my good friends and colleagues, Mr. BEN BLAZ, Mr. GEORGE MILLER, and Mr. JAIME FUSTER.

Mr. Speaker, there are certain individuals in our territorial government who also should be commended for their work in this emergency. I recognize the diligence and leadership performance of our Commissioner of Public Safety, High Talking Chief Tuilefano Vaelaa and all the men and women who are associated with our law enforcement agency; High Chief Maiava Olive Hunkin as director of our territorial emergency programs; Mr. Abe Malae and Mr. Perelini Perelini of our local power, water, and waste water agency; Mr. Ace Tago as treasurer and in charge of the territory's finances; Mr. Aleki Sene in charge of our telecommunications systems; and our editors of our two newspapers—the Samoa News and Samoa Journal. Last but not least, the management of both radio stations—radio station WVUV and radio station KSBS.

AMERICAN SAMOA GOVERNMENT,
Pago Pago, American Samoa,
February 6, 1990.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, DC.
Through: Regional Director, FEMA Region IX, San Francisco, CA.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Under the provisions of Section 401, Public Law 93-288, as amended by Public Law 100-707, as implemented by 44 CFR 206.36, I request that you declare a major disaster for American Samoa as a result of Hurricane "OFA". Damage was widespread in the territory as a result of road erosion caused by high wave surge. There was widespread damage to roads, buildings, utilities, homes, businesses and agricultural crops. The total extent of the damage is not known at this time. Preliminary damage surveys are continuing. Water and power are hampering early recovery. No fatalities are known at the present time. Due to advance warning, injuries have been minimal although in excess of 75 to 100 have been reported with 28 requiring hospital treatment.

The preliminary assessment of areas that have been surveyed:

Private Residence—4,000 affected.
Number of Businesses—Unknown.
Agricultural—95 percent destroyed.
Primary secondary school system—$8 million.
Electric Utilities—$7.4 million.
Federal aid roads—$4 million.

The storm commenced on Friday, February 2, 1990, with the aftermath still in progress as this is written. The storm affected all of American Samoa: Tutuila, Ta'u, Ofu, Olosega and Swains Island. Any damage to Rose Atoll must be assessed when weather conditions permit aerial inspection. We do not have a firm indication of when this storm will subside.

In response to the situation, I have taken the appropriate action under Territorial Law and directed the execution of the Territorial Emergency Plan pursuant to a State of Emergency declared by Acting Governor Galea'i P. Poumele on Sunday, February 4, 1990. I have also directed all appropriate actions be taken under Territorial Law.

On February 6, 1990, I also requested a joint Federal-Territorial Survey on the damaged areas. That survey is underway today. I have determined that this incident is of such severity and magnitude that effective response is beyond the capabilities of the territorial government which also assumes the functions of local government as normally found in the States.

I am respectfully requesting all appropriate Individual Assistance, Public Assistance, Unemployment Assistance and Small Business Administration Assistance.

Our government is currently engaged in a Financial Recovery Program designed to eradicate a budgetary deficit of $12 million. Nevertheless, I intend to meet with the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Legislature of American Samoa just as soon as the weather makes such a meeting possible, to fashion an emergency legislative package to provide additional financial resources to help alleviate this crisis. It is my intention to call a special session of the Legislature for this purpose at the earliest possible time. I have also taken initial steps to have the American Samoa Army Reserve activated to assist in recovery efforts as appropriate.

I intend to implement the Individual and Family Grant Program (IFGP). I certify that the territory is unable to immediately pay its 25 percent share of the cost to implement the program and request that the American Samoa Government share be loaned by the Federal Government. I certify that the loan will be repaid as soon as funds become available. I anticipate that funds will become available by the close of the current fiscal year on September 30, 1990. However, it is my intention to ask for a waiver of the territorial share when costs are known.

I certify, for this major disaster, that the territorial government will assume all applicable non-federal shares of costs required by Public Law 93-388, as amended by Public Law 101-707. Total expenditures for which no Federal reimbursement will be requested is unknown at this time.

I have designated Lieutenant Governor Galea'i P. Poumele as the Territorial Coordinating Officer for this request. He will work with the Federal Emergency Management Agency in damage assessments and may provide further information or justification on my behalf.

Sincerely,

PETER TALI COLEMAN,
Governor.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, DC, February 9, 1990.

Hon. ROBERT H. MORRIS,
Acting Director, Federal Emergency Management Agency, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. MORRIS: I have determined that the damage in certain areas of the Territory of American Samoa, resulting from Hurricane Ofa beginning on February 2, 1990, is of sufficient severity and magnitude to warrant a major disaster declaration under Public Law 93-288, as amended by Public Law 100-707. I, therefore, declare that such a major disaster exists in the Territory of American Samoa.

In order to provide Federal assistance, you are hereby authorized to allocate from funds available for these purposes, such amounts as you find necessary for Federal disaster assistance and administrative expenses.

You are authorized to provide Individual Assistance and Public Assistance in the designated areas. Consistent with the requirement that Federal assistance be supplemental, any Federal funds provided under PL 93-288, as amended by PL 100-707, for Public Assistance will be cost shared. The final terms of this cost sharing arrangement can include per capita cost sharing.

Sincerely,

GEORGE BUSH.

U.S. DISASTER RESPONSE TEAM IN WESTERN SAMOA

APIA, WESTERN SAMOA—For the 57 members of the U.S. Pacific Command's Joint Task Force in Western Samoa, it seemed as though getting here was the hardest part. Hurricane Ofa began hitting this island nation on Thursday Feb 1, with winds that eventually exceeded 160 knots. Damage was extensive. The Government of Western Samoa (GOWS) requested assistance from the United States. The U.S. Pacific Commander in Hawaii designated the U.S. Army Western Command its executive agent for the formation and deployment of a disaster response joint task force to assess the damage caused by the storm.

The response would have gladdened an old soldier's heart. Fifty soldiers, five airmen and two Navy Seabees—from disparate units all over Oahu, many with only two hours notice—began assembling at Hickam Air Force Base at 10 a.m. Tuesday, Feb 6. They were unquestionably ready (and eager) to go. But Ofa frustrated them. The storm refused to leave Western Samoa. The team waited at Hickam most of Tuesday, then assembled twice the following day. The weather refused to break. Late Wednesday, they were recalled. Take off of the huge C-5A Galaxy that was to rush them to Apia came at 3:00 a.m., Thursday, Feb 8.

When they arrived at Western Samoa's Faleolo International Airport five and a half hours later, the rain had stopped for the most part but the local skies were darkly overcast and heavy with moisture.

The team quickly disembarked and began offloading its equipment. The Joint Task Force (JTF) was operational two hours after its arrival. Twenty-four hours later, its two UH-60 Blackhawk helicopters from the 53rd Aviation Bn., 25th Inf Div (Light) had been test flown and were ready to respond to requests from the GOWS for emergency assistance missions.

Maj. Bill Walsh, Operations officer of the 45th Support Group, quickly set up an operations center in two small borrowed rooms behind the airports' control tower. After a week's operations, Maj. Walsh was the only team member still sleeping there each night—to stay on top of every thing happening.

Initially, all JTF members were billeted in storm-damaged buildings at the airport. There was no running water or electricity at the camp but morale—fed by cold "meals ready to eat"—was high. The unit set about preparing for search and rescue and damage assessment operations. Col. John M. Castleberry, the JTF commander, met with the prime minister and several cabinet members to discuss the unit's mission and priorities. He and other JTF officers met with officials of the Peace Corps, which has a major effort in Western Samoa, with a total of 54 volunteers assigned to villages on the two main islands of Upolu and Savaii.

The JTF's top initial priority was search and rescue (SAR) for U.S. citizens, 15 of which were unaccounted for after the hurricane. Within 24 hours, all had been found, none of them hurt. The second priority was medical evacuation—getting seriously injured Samoans to medical facilities in Apia for treatment.

Next came the distribution of the food, tools and emergency medical equipment. Not forgotten was the JTF's basic task of damage assessment.

Late Saturday night, the JTF's third day in country, the GOWS requested an emergency medical evaluation. An accident on Savaii had resulted in one death and three injuries, two of them very serious. A blackhawk took off with the unit's doctor, Maj. Cliff Cloonan, an emergency medicine specialist from Tripler Army Medical Center in Hawaii, abroad. In two night flights, they returned the injured, and the body, to the hospital in Apia. The aircrew, who had flown all day Saturday, finally stood down at 3:00 a.m. Sunday.

Dr. Cloonan, working with Preventive Medicine Specialist Mark Hanne of the 25th Inf. Div. at Schofield Barracks, have also conducted a public health assessment on both main islands. With this now completed, they are now coordinating distribution of emergency medical supplies.

While the basic mission of the Disaster Response JTF is damage assessment, in some instances task force members have been able to contribute directly to the restoration of services. All electrical power was knocked out by the hurricane. The local power company is still in the process of restoring service on the island of Upolu. One of the most difficult locations to restore service to will be in the INTELSAT station, 12 miles into the hills behind the capital of Apia at an elevation of 2750 feet. Not only are the lines down, but for long stretches of the only partially-paved road leading to the site, the poles themselves were blown down by the storm's high winds.

The backup generator at the site is an old one and inoperative because of a lack of spare parts that have to be ordered from England. Without electrical power at the satellite earth station, the island nation had no communications with the outside world.

The JTF arrived with a 50 KW generator, intended as its own power source. Since power was restored to much of the airport area shortly after their arrival, the generator was no longer needed for this. It was made available to the GOWS so this vital service could be restored.

SSgt. Kevin W. Sargent, NCO in Charge of the Power Generation Team, was the right man for the job. The 8-year Army veteran, a master fitness trainer as well as generator mechanic supervisor, enjoys overseas duty and can best be described as a real people-to-people American. The day after the JTF's arrival, he and his 4-man team struggled up the mountain in their aging 2½-ton truck with the generator in tow, hooked it up, ensured it was running well, and instructed Western Samoan operators in how to keep it running. That night, it went down. The next morning, it was learned that a new shift of operators had come on duty and a few details had been lost in translation. A new routine puts the Army team back up at the satellite dish at each shift change. Uninterrupted power now permits tens of thousands of Western Samoans to communicate with worried relatives in New Zealand and elsewhere. SSgt. Sargent, meanwhile, has found Western Samoa a beautiful place and its people delightful. "I'd like to come back sometime on my own," he says.

After arriving in the storm-torn island nation, the JTF's Damage Assessment Team, headed by Lt. Col. Greg Maronski—who is also the deputy JTF commander—quickly determined that one of the greatest needs was the reopening of many miles of roads washed out by Hurricane Ofa. One big obstacle blocked all progress in this direction: the local quarries were inoperative. Crushed rock and gravel essential to the road-repair task could not be produced.

SSgt. Robert G. Parsons is a quarry foreman supervisor assigned to the 45th Support Group's 84th Engineer Battalion at Schofield Barracks, Hawaii. SSgt. Parsons has been to Western Samoa twice before on a civic action assignment with the same objective: provide the GOWS Public Works Department with working quarries to produce rock and gravel. He spent a few days on a reconnaissance in June 1989, then returned for a longer stay in Aug. and Sept. When he returned to his unit in Hawaii, Western Samoa had two functioning rock quarries—and SSgt. Parson had a wide circle of good friends. But the storm shut the quarries down again.

JTF Commander Col. John Castleberry is also commanding officer of the 45th Spt. Gp. When he realized the urgent need for rock and gravel, he immediately ordered SSgt Parson's return. The old Samoan hand caught an Air Force C-141 to Pago Pago, American Samoa with two heavy equipment mechanics, Sgt. Donald Byron and Spec. Eric Holt. The three were ferried into Apia by JTF UH-60 on Saturday, Feb. 9.

The warm welcome with which SSgt. Parsons was met by many of his old Western Samoan friends made a lasting impression on JTF members who had preceded him here. SSgt. Parsons says he's happy to see his old friends again and to be able to give them a helping hand. Chris Hewson, a New Zealander who operates the quarries for the GOWS, adds, "I was bloody glad to see him, too."

The joint task force is truly a joint effort. Air Force Major Jack Snyder commands Detachment 5, Air Rescue Service, and also serves as a special assistant for rescue on the Pacific Air Forces staff at Hickman Air Force Base in Hawaii. He deployed with the JIF as the head of a 5-man Air Force search and rescue (SAR) team. Following completion of the initial SAR effort, he has coordinated all JFT emergency resupply missions, working out of the National Police headquarters in Apia.

Two members of the Commander, Construction Battalions, Pacific staff at Makalapa deployed with the fly-away units. Lt. Mike Blount and Senior Chief Tom Wright were tasked with performing harbor, channel, pier and ferry damage assessments. After wrapping up their own work, the Seabees joined Army Capt. Michael Richey, Engineer Construction Officer with the 84th Eng. Bn. and Sgt. Maj. Wayne Casteel of the Army's Western Command staff in performing damage assessments on the roads circling the islands of Upolu and Savaii. This, too, has now been completed.

The JIF also has an element in American Samoa. Maj. Greg Corley, senior U.S. officer there, heads up a contingent of 14 soldiers from the 84th Eng. Bn. who arrived in Pago Pago on Feb. 8 with three 60 KW and two 5 KW generators. Their mission: to provide an emergency power supply for electric lighting, water and sewer operations.

As the local commercial power company restored service to one area, the Army engineers leapfrogged their generators to another. Seventy-five percent of the American territory's power service has now been restored with their emergency help. At the request of Governor Peter Coleman, the team also flew an emergency mission to the small island of Manua, delivering parts and the expertise to get that small community's only power generator back in operation.

A more permanent type of help is being provided by a detachment of 32 Seabees headed by Lt. Eric Sorrell, who arrived from Guam on Feb 12. Their mission is to raise or replace utility poles knocked down by the storm and repair severed power lines.

By dusk on the seventh day in Western Samoa, the JIF's hard-working aircrews had flown a total of 32 aerial resupply missions, delivering a total of 18.5 short tons of urgently needed food, medical equipment and tools and equipment needed for rebuilding the isolated villages all over Western Samoa.

A different sort of mission was flown Sunday. England's Queen Elizabeth and Prince Edinburgh, decided to fly to Western Samoa to inspect the damage caused by the hurricane. At the request of the GOWS, JTF's two helicopters provided the Duke and his party an extensive tour of both main islands. Col. Castleberry briefed him on the JTF's operations.

The colonel has been spending long hours with American Charge de Affairs Bill Francisco, the prime minister of Western Samoa, Governor Peter Coleman of American Samoa and the territory's congressional delegate Eni Faleomavaega, who returned from Washington to inspect damage and facilitate relief.

Col. Castleberry has good reason to be proud of his troops, at the end of their first week's operations. He says he's most impressed by the performance of the young, junior soldiers. "They all pitched in to unload the plane and get up upon our arrival. They had us operational within 2 hours. They've been working 17-18-hour days ever since with professionalism and total dedication in extreme tropical conditions. I haven't heard a single complaint, nor have we had a single accident or adverse incident. Morale is high and the JTF is moving full steam ahead."

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people of the U.S. Virgin Islands I would like to send our sincere regrets to our sister territory of American Samoa in the aftermath of Hurricane Ofa. We in the Virgin Islands also are saddened to hear of the total destruction on Western Samoa, the neighboring islands which bore the brunt of the storm, and where 11 deaths have been recorded to date.

Ofa damaged or destroyed over 50 percent of American Samoa's structures. It totally destroyed 175 homes and severely damaged another 417 homes, leaving many homeless. According to a FEMA's estimate 3,719 homes were affected by this catastrophe in American Samoa. Power was knocked out and is being restored.

I know all too well the terrible shock that my colleague, ENI FALEOMAVAEGA, and the good people of American Samoa are now going through. It was only last September 17 that Hurricane Hugo and its terrible winds devastated the U.S. Virgin Islands, with extremely severe damage to the island of St. Croix. We are still feeling its effects everyday, in our economy, our schools, our hospitals, and our homes. Rebuilding is slow and arduous, but we in the Virgin Islands sympathize with our friends in American Samoa who must also go down this difficult road of reconstruction.

Before long, American Samoans will be very familiar with the workings of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, Small Business Administration, Department of the Interior, and other agencies that must be counted on for assistance in such terrible disasters. These Federal agencies must do their best to see that the recovery is complete—from rebuilding public buildings and homes to restoring power, phone and roads, and even the traditional tales that represent the strong community spirit of the people of American Samoa.

I will stand behind the U.S. territory of American Samoa throughout this rough period, and do all I can to help the people of American Samoa through their recovery from Hurricane Ofa.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my friend and colleague, Congressman FALEOMAVAEGA, in directing your attention to a catastrophe that befell American Samoa in early February. Sadly, it was a tragedy of a proportion that, had it occurred on the American mainland, would have been page one news for several days. I'm afraid few of us heard about Hurricane Ofa. Unfortunately, the people of American Samoa will not soon forget it.

I had the good fortune to visit American Samoa last summer, as the leader of a delegation of members from the House Interior Committee, and including Interior Secretary Manuel Lujan. It is a beautiful place, populated by hospitable and caring people. Those memories make it all the more troubling for me to acknowledge the level of devastation inflicted on these islands by Hurricane Ofa.

Miraculously, there were no reported fatalities. But the damage was incredible.

I am pleased to know that American disaster relief agencies, both public and private, moved quickly to help in American Samoa, along with elements of the U.S. Armed Forces. Much of the suffering was immediately tended to. But we all know that real recovery in such situations can take months, if not years.

As chairman of the committee with jurisdiction over American insular areas, I want Congressman FALEOMAVAEGA to know that I stand ready to lend a hand in whatever long-term help we can offer.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call attention to the plight of the people of American Samoa and Western Samoa, who are just now beginning to recover from the devastating impact of Hurricane Ofa, which struck the islands with 130-plus mile an hour winds on February 4.

I particularly want to express my deepest sympathies to the families of the eight residents of Western Samoa who were killed in the combination of heavy winds and tidal waves which surged over the islands. At this time of great national tragedy, my heart particularly goes out to all those who now find themselves suddenly bereft of a loved one.

Imagine, if you will, the chaos of the storm at its height: Roofs being ripped off houses, wave surge sweeping entire buildings off their foundations, tearing up roads and destroying electric pylons, two large inter-island ferries being thrown up on shore in Apia harbor as all dock and port facilities there were destroyed, entire seaside villages being engulfed by 20- to 25-foot waves of sand and water on the island of Savai'i in Western Samoa and eastern part of Tactuila island in American Samoa, and crops being wiped out as large portions of the islands were totally stripped of their foliage.

In both American Samoa, which is a U.S. territory, and in Western Samoa, which is an independent state, the destruction wrought by Ofa was heavy, and, in many cases, total.

In American Samoa alone, which was declared a disaster zone by President Bush on February 9, recent reports estimate that 85 businesses and well over 400 homes were either wiped out completely or heavily damaged. To date, almost 5,000 people have applied for temporary housing at the FEMA office which has been set up in Pago Pago.

On both islands, electricity is still out in many areas, and the need for medical supplies and facilities is great.

I also understand that between 20,000 and 25,000 individuals were made homeless in Western Samoa by the storm. Compounding difficulties in reconstruction efforts is the fact that much of that country's communications network is still inoperable.

And as if the situation there weren't bad enough, I am told that an even more serious crisis—a shortage of food—is now facing the inhabitants of Western Samoa.

I understand that over 95 percent of the breadfruit, banana, avocado and papaya crops in Western Samoa were destroyed by the storm. According to experts on the scene, between only 1 and 2 weeks of food supply is currently left, and it is estimated that it will take over 6 months before the country can once again reach self-sufficiency in food.

According to press reports, it is estimated by Western Samoan Government officials that almost $18 million will be required to meet the emergency food needs of the people, a sum which amounts to one-third of the entire Government operating budget for last year. This is an enormous sum for a Government seeking to undertake the wholesale reconstruction of large parts of its countryside.

I understand that the United States has provided some assistance in the form of outlays from Ambassadors' discretionary funds and in-kind contributions from U.S. CINCPAC, which I think were provided on a timely basis and serve as a shining example of the best humanitarian traditions of United States foreign assistance.

In conjunction with other assistance from other regional governments, such as New Zealand, Australia, and Japan, and international organizations, such as the United Nations, the beneficial impact of our assistance is beginning to be felt. Electric power is being restored, food and medical aid is starting to reach the populace, roads are beginning to be rebuilt, and temporary housing is under construction.

Nevertheless, the U.S. Government and the American people as a whole have an obligation to do more for the people of American and Western Samoa immediately, in this, their hour of most urgent and desperate need.

In particular, immediate action is necessary to head off what could become a serious food shortage in Western Samoa. I understand that the government of Western Samoa is seeking to purchase flour and rice, and I hope it would be possible for the United States to assist in this effort, working in conjunction with Western Samoa, in order to avert a famine.

I stand ready to work with all my colleagues, particularly ENI FALEOMAVAEGA from American Samoa whose hard work in the islands in the immediate wake of the storm deserve our praise and gratitude, to seek the resources necessary to make sure these pressing needs are met.

I would be sorely remiss if I didn't note that ENI has done an outstanding job in bringing the grave situation facing American Samoa and Western Samoa to the attention of the Congress—this special order being just the latest example of his efforts. Over the time I have served with him in the Congress, his unique perspective and intimate knowledge about the South Pacific have provided the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs, which I chair, with invaluable expertise and understanding about the region. His efforts in the wake of Hurricane Ofa are further proof of his dedication to his constituents and the region as a whole.

Mr. FUSTER. Mr. Speaker, I am no stranger to the devastation caused by hurricanes. My island of Puerto Rico certainly suffered its share of destruction wreaked by Hurricane Hugo, which hit the Caribbean and South Carolina last September with particular viciousness. Now come reports of similar devastation in the Pacific Ocean, this time in the home district of our colleague, Delegate ENI F.H. FALEOMAVAEGA of American Samoa.

According to the distinguished Congressman from American Samoa, Hurricane Ofa slashed across his islands on February 2, washing away roads, stripping trees bare, destroying 95 percent of farm crops and leaving hundreds of families homeless. Damages to roads alone were estimated at more than $4 million. Public schools suffered an estimated $7.4 million in damages.

The litany of losses continues. It reads like a repeat of the tragedy in Puerto Rico which I detailed at length to my same colleagues here in the House last September. For example, some 4,000 homes in Samoa have been either severely damaged or destroyed. In many Samoan coastal villages, many homes were simply washed away. Similarly, a large number of Samoan businesses suffered severe damages. Two weeks after Hurricane Ofa struck, the majority of American Samoan families were still without electricity.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, we in Puerto Rico know what all of that means. So, my full compassion goes out to the American Samoan people, and I know all of us want to see the recovery process there expedited. Already, relief teams from the Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA], the Army Corps of Engineers and the Red Cross, among others, are on the scene to reconstruct buildings and to offer other forms of assistance.

But, as my distinguished colleague, ENI FALEOMAVAEGA, has pointed out, the road to recovery will be a very difficult one, despite all of the work currently under way. Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to remember American Samoa in its hour of need. Our fellow Americans in Samoa can't do the full job of recovery by themselves, and I further urge that we in the Congress find ways to help the Samoans over the financial hump that they are bound to face in the months ahead.

Mr. BLAZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise in solidarity with my fellow Pacific islanders in the South Pacific. I am speaking of the plight which befell the islands of American Samoa from late on Friday, February 2, 1990.

Packing winds of over 100 miles per hour, Hurricane Ofa knocked out electricity, tore off roofs, and forced the evacuation of hundreds of residents. Fortunately, injuries to persons were minor, but the hurricane disrupted communications and caused a blackout of information to the outside world.

Ofa's winds destroyed electrical power to about 90 percent of American Samoa's principal island, Tutuila. Airport officials closed American Samoa's main airport in the west of Tutuila for days. Winds gusting to over 100 miles per hour had blown off the roof of one of the airport's hangars.

High waves along the north of Tutuila led officials of the American Samoa Government to evacuate scores upon scores of residents. The territory's emergency management committee reported flooding as well. In the Manu'a Islands of American Samoa, 60 miles to the east of Tutuila, high waves also damaged docks.

Members of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers arrived in American Samoa and have begun assessing damage to our fellow citizens and nationals from Hurricane Ofa. At least two-thirds of the territory's residents went without water because of the power outage. Even days after Ofa had struck, areas outside of Tutuila's central villages of Utulei, Fagatogo, and Pago Pago remained blacked out, especially in the villages of Nu'uuli and Tafuna.

Those assessing damage found that the hurricane had damaged buildings and roads, toppled power poles and stripped palm, breadfruit, and banana trees. Leaving thousands of residents homeless, Ofa has caused tens of million of dollars' worth of repairs.

It was my pleasure earlier this month to join our colleague, Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA, in contacting the White House to urge that it issue a Presidential Declaration of Emergency for the people of American Samoa. I was happy to learn that, the morning after my call to the office of the Chief of Staff, the White House issued the declaration. This will prove a tremendous help to the people of American Samoa. This action by the White House has provided the mechanism to help the territory to rebuild and recover from Ofa's affects.

On behalf of the people of Guam, I offer our fellow citizens and nationals in American Samoa full moral support at this very difficult time in their territory's history.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, on February 2, 1990, the islands of Samoa—both American Samoa and the independent nation of Western Samoa—were devastated by Hurricane Ofa.

American Samoa was declared a disaster area by President Bush on February 9, 1990. High velocity winds, tidal waves, and heavy rains have caused extensive damage to public utilities, private homes, businesses, and agriculture. A disaster field office has been set up in the capital at Pago Pago to provide needed assistance.

Western Samoa has also suffered extensive damage. Here, the hurricane has claimed 13 lives. Those injured number in the hundreds. Without immediate emergency assistance, banana and breadfruit crop losses present a threat of famine.

My colleague, Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA, has been at the forefront working to provide relief to the Samoan Islands. I would like to extend my concern for his tireless efforts and offer my full support in seeking appropriate aid for the victims of this disaster.

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join my dear friend and colleague, Congressman ENI FALEOMAVAEGA of American Samoa, to call the attention of Congress to the devastating hurricane, Hurricane Ofa, which hit American Samoa and Western Samoa on February 2. I do so to ask the support of my colleagues to provide additional resources if that becomes necessary. I also wish to extend my deepest sympathy to the families of those who died in Western Samoa, and commiserate with my Pacific Island friends in the Samoas.

The immediate effects of Hurrican Ofa were devastating to say the least, and its continuing impact grave. Fortunately, though damage and destruction of property was extensive, there were no deaths in American Samoa. However, hundreds were injured, some seriously. Twelve died in Western Samoa. We in Hawaii, especially the Samoan community, have risen to the emergency with food and clothing drives. However, the devastation is so great that volunteer action alone will not meet the crisis of food, clothing and housing, and power shortages. Immediate congressional action may become necessary after a more complete posthurricane assessment is completed, and I urge my colleague to rise to the occasion.

Under the proven and forceful leadership of Congressman FALEOMAVAEGA, the administration acted with alacrity to come to the assistance of American Samoa. Once requested by Governor Coleman for a declaration of emergency on February 9, the President declared American Samoa to be a major disaster area within 3 days, thus setting the stage for immedate action by the Federal Emergency Management Agency which I'm advised is doing a splendid job with the resources available to it. I want to assure Congressman FALEOMAVAEGA that he and the people of Samoa have my full support.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA. Mr. Speaker, I just want to inform my colleagues concerning certain names that were not included in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I certainly do not fault the recorders and reporting staff, because some of these names are in the Samoan language, and as such they were just not able to correctly spell the names of those individuals whom I mentioned in my statement yesterday.

Mr. Speaker, for the record, I made reference to the honorable president of the senate who is Paramount Chief Letuli Toloa, and also our speaker of the house, High Chief Tuana'itau Tuia.

Additionally Mr. Speaker, I made reference to Lt. Gov. Galea'i Poumele, who is presently in charge of our overall territorial disaster task force to address the problems caused by Hurricane Ofa.

Mr. Speaker, I want to note the names of the above gentlemen as it should have been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I appreciate very much the patience and professionalism of our reporters and printers who work so diligently each day to provide what I consider the most comprehensive and accurate accounting of our proceedings each day we are in session.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to add for the RECORD a statement from my dear friend and colleague, the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. AKAKA] for his support and willingness to assist me with whatever Samoa may need as a result of the devastation caused by Hurricane Ofa.

Mr. Speaker, thank you for your attention to this matter.

SENATE—Wednesday, February 28, 1990

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 23, 1990)

The Senate met at 10:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As we reverence our Father and our Maker, we will be led in prayer by the Senate Chaplain, the Reverend Dr. Richard C. Halverson.

Dr. Halverson.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D. offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this; that power belongeth unto God.—Psalm 62:11.

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, listening to Senator PRESSLER's report on the election in Nicaragua was both exciting and disturbing. His description, "citizens thirsting to vote," 150 people waiting in the rain at 6 a.m., some having arrived at 3 a.m., one could not avoid thinking of our last national election when nearly 50 percent of the people did not bother to go to the polls.

What is happening to us as a nation, Father? At a time when democracy is winning all over the world, are we forfeiting it at home? Have we forgotten our legacy: "inalienable rights," "endowed by God," "government instituted to secure those rights, receiving its just powers from the consent of the governed," despite which many have divorced themselves from people sovereignty and abandoned the democratic process. Forgive us, patient God, for our indifference, our apathy—our cynicism. Reawaken us to the moral obligation of citizenship, fundamental to our political system. Renew us in fresh commitment to our cherished Republic.

In the name of Jesus who said, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order.

Under the standing order, the majority leader is recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, this morning, following the time for the two leaders, there will be a period for morning business until 11 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each. At 11 a.m., the Senate will resume consideration of S. 1430, the national community service bill. Senators should be alerted that rollcall votes are expected throughout today's session.

RESERVATION OF LEADERS' TIME

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my leader time, and I reserve all of the time of the distinguished Republican leader.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the remainder of the time of the two leaders is reserved.

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There will now be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 11 a.m. with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REID. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CAMPAIGN REFORM

Mr. REID. Mr. President, we live in a country with the best system of government in the world. In the past year, our political tradition has inspired millions throughout Europe, South America, Africa, and the Far East.

The symbol of freedom and democracy in China's Tiananmen Square was the Statue of Liberty.

The cries of freedom in East Berlin and South Africa were sung to the strains of "We Shall Overcome."

In the last few days, a free election was held in Nicaragua for the first time in its history.

If the Berlin Wall can come down and Nelson Mandela can be set free, then surely we in America can reform a part of our own political system. I am talking about campaign finance reform and the need for reform.

Genuine campaign reform in the United States can come about only through bipartisan cooperation.

For years, we have seen a lot of posturing on this issue. One side says: "Abolish PAC's or nothing." The other side says: "Campaign spending limits or nothing."

This "all or nothing" attitude on both sides solves exactly one thing: nothing. It solves nothing.

There are several issues on which agreement and real reform are feasible. It is possible, this year and in this Congress, to do something about independent expenditures, bundling, the "Millionaire's Loophole," abuse of so-called loans that candidates make their campaigns, and the complete and utter absence of tough penalties and procedures to enforce present campaign laws.

The bill I have introduced with Senator MCCONNELL of Kentucky can be the bipartisan nucleus of real campaign reform. In 1990, a year in which other nations around the world will take broad, courageous steps to reform their own political processes.

The Federal Election Enforcement Act addresses many campaign problems, but none as critical as the shortcomings of the FEC.

The FEC is a toothless tiger. Real campaign reform will give teeth to the Federal Election Commission. Fake reform will ignore the FEC.

The first 11 sections of our bill will stiffen penalties and streamline the enforcement process.

The average Senate campaign now costs over $3 million, and some campaigns spend much more than that. A fine of $5,000 for an FEC violation is a drop in the bucket for most political campaigns. Our bill will make penalties count. Violators must be punished where it hurts: in the checkbook and in the court of public opinion.

Not only does this bill stiffen penalties, but it reduces the amount of time in which the FEC must act and gives the FEC injunctive powers.

Our legislation also solves the tie-vote problem at the FEC. Under present law, there are three Republican members of the FEC and three Democrats. Under our legislation, complainants can sue in any U.S. district court if the FEC is deadlocked by a tie vote.

Currently, complainants can sue only in the D.C. Federal court—an unnecessary hardship for candidates or campaigns in Nevada or Massachusetts or Florida or anywhere outside the beltway.

None of the other provisions in this bill or in S. 137 or in any other campaign reform bill will mean anything without the FEC reform offered by the Federal Election Enforcement Act. This is the only bill that contains such reform.

Mr. President, these are historic times. There is a tide of freedom and reform sweeping across the world. In Berlin, Prague, Warsaw, Johannesburg, Managua, and elsewhere, America is once again an inspiration to millions of people yearning to breathe free.

We have set high standards for oursevles and others. To paraphrase a famous passage, "Responsibility is the first step toward reform." Let us take up that responsibility and pass laws, here in Washington, that meet our high ideals.

We owe it to ourselves; we owe it to our constituents, and they are right when they demand nothing less.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I had come to the floor with the intention of speaking when the Senate went on the pending bill and had explained to the Chair prior to seeking the floor that that was my intention, but since there is no one on the floor for morning business I thought I would utilize this time. As I had explained to the Chair, my comments cannot be completed in the course of 5 minutes but since no one else is on the floor I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to speak in excess of 5 minutes, if I may up to 10 minutes at this time, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for not to exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. SPECTER pertaining to the submission of Senate Resolution 252 are located in today's RECORD under "Submission of Concurrent and Senate Resolutions.")

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to inform my colleagues that today marks the 1,810th day that Terry Anderson has been held in captivity in Beirut.

I would also like to remark that Peggy Say's recent visit to Syria has brought more promising news. Reports of her sanguine reaction to meetings with Syrian cabinet ministers were included in articles from yesterday's Buffalo News and New York Times. I ask unanimous consent that these articles be reprinted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SIGNS OF HOPE FOR LEBANON HOSTAGES

(By Ihsan A. Hijazi)

BEIRUT, LEBANON, February 26.—Encouraged by promising signals from Iran, Syria plans a new effort to free 18 Western hostages believed held in Lebanon by Shiite Muslim militants with connections to Iran, a relative of an American hostage said today.

Peggy Say, the sister of an American journalist who was kidnapped five years ago, said the Syrian Foreign Minister, Farouk al-Sharaa, told her that he would soon visit Teheran, Iran, to discuss freedom for the captives.

Mrs. Say, whose brother is Terry Anderson, told reporters in Damascus today that Mr. Sharaa told her of his projected trip when the two met late last week. She said she was heartened by the Syrian offer.

"Instead of leaving the Middle East with heavy heart like I always do, I feel the burden has been lifted," Mrs. Say said.

Syria, the main foreign power broker in Lebanon with 40,000 troops that virtually control two-thirds of Lebanon's territory, has played a role in past releases of American, French and other Western hostages in Lebanon.

Mr. Anderson, now 42 years old, was the Middle East bureau chief for The Associated Press when he was kidnapped by gunmen in West Beirut. An organization calling itself Islamic Holy War took responsibility for his abduction. The same group said it was holding another American, Thomas Sutherland, the acting dean of agriculture at the American University of Beirut.

Mohammed Salman, Syria's Information Minister, told Mrs. Say that his Government was optimistic about the eventual release of the hostages in light of the latest statements from Teheran, but that he did not expect it at once. Sana, the state-run Syrian press agency, quoted him as saying, "This is because the matter needs a thorough study, patience and coordination between local and international quarters."

Mrs. Say left today for London, where she is to meet the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Most Rev. Robert Runcie, whose envoy, Terry Waite, is also missing in Lebanon. Mrs. Say has also met recently with Pope John Paul II and with Yasir Arafat, the chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organization, in her campaign to free her brother.

SHIITE LEADER URGES RELEASE

Last Thursday, the Government-controlled English-language daily newspaper Teheran Times called for prompt freedom for the captives in Lebanon. Today the newspaper quoted Iran's top Shiite Muslim justice as saying that his country opposes hostage taking, terrorism and air piracy because "they are contrary to Islamic and humanitarian principles."

The official, Ayatollah Mohammed Yazdi, was quoted in an exclusive interview with the paper that was excerpted and distributed by Iran's official press agency.

Last Friday Sheik Mohammed Hussein Fadlallah, the spiritual mentor of the Lebanese Party of God, said the time had come to free the hostages. The Party of God, while denying any role in hostage taking, is widely thought to be the parent organization for kidnappers operating under different titles.

Sheik Fadlallah's statement was not his first call for the release of the captives, but the timing of the statement lends it significance. He had just returned from Teheran, where he attended the celebration of the eleventh anniversary of the Islamic revolution. Sheikh Fadlallah met with Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's religious leader, and President Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani.

Islamic Holy War insists that Kuwait release 17 pro-Iranian Lebanese who were convicted of bomb attacks in Kuwait seven years ago. Iran has demanded that in return for using its influence with kidnappers here, three Iranian diplomats and their Lebanese chauffeur, who vanished in northern Lebanon eight years ago, must be found.

SAY IS OPTIMISTIC AFTER VISIT TO SYRIA

BEIRUT, LEBANON.—The sister of U.S. hostage Terry Anderson said Monday she was optimistic his five years of captivity could soon end and urged hi not to despair.

"You are all sent strength, love and hope," said Peggy Say, formerly of Batavia, NY, in an open letter addressed to Anderson and 16 other Westerners held hostage in Lebanon. "Do not despair, for someday—soon, please God—we will all be reunited," she said in the letter released here by the Associated Press.

Anderson, 42, was Middle East bureau chief for AP when kidnapped in Beirut in March 1985. The pro-Iranian Islamic Jihad, or Holy War, claimed responsibility.

An Arabic translation of the letter was published in Beirut on the front page of the independent An-Nahar and on an inside page in the leftist As-Safir. A second message, signed by Bill Foley in the name of the Journalists Committee to Free Terry Anderson, said "Countless people around the world remember all of you and work to end your suffering."

Mrs. Say, on a tour with an AP delegation, Monday ended a visit to Syria, an ally of Iran, where she sought the help of Cabinet ministers in winning Anderson's release. She said she was heartened by a Syrian offer of help.

"Instead of leaving (the Middle East) with a heavy heart like I always do, I feel the burden has been lifted," she said in Damascus. "For several years the situation seemed only to get more complicated. Soon, God willing, we will be united . . . There is no doubt in my mind that nobody wants this hostage situation to end more than Syria."

Iran's main opposition group said Monday in Geneva that Tehran had offered to secure the release of the hostages in exchange for a less-critical United Nations report on Iran's human rights situation.

THE NICARAGUA ELECTIONS: BEWARE OF TROJAN HORSES

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the election results in the Nicaraguan elections constitute a stunning reversal for Daniel Ortega and the Communist Sandinistas—a verdict by the people, of the people and for the people of Nicaragua. What we see all over the world is that, if you give the people a chance in a free and fair election, the people will overwhelmingly reject communism.

We saw the people reject communism in Poland. We saw it in Czechoslovakia. We saw it just last Sunday in Lithuania. We saw that East Germany, Bulgaria, Hungary, Estonia, and Latvia are just itching for elections in the next few weeks so they can vote against communism. The only people that like communism are the tyrants themselves.

But whether, in the long-run, Ortega and his cohorts will accept the will of the people is by no means clear. The statements of Ortega yesterday indicate that he is willing to give up the Presidency, but not the real base of his political power, the so-called Popular Sandinista Army [EPS] and the Sandinista Party members installed in key government positions of power. If Nicaragua is to be free from communism, Nicaragua must have fundamental reform; but it is now apparent that Ortega and the Sandinistas can be expected to block every attempt at reform.

So the battle for freedom in Nicaragua is just beginning. Let's face it: There would have been no election had the freedom fighters not waged their lonely and hard-fought battle against the Sandinista tyranny. It must not be overlooked, in this time of exultation, that the only thing the Sandinista regime ever worried about was the determination of the freedom fighters to make it possible for free government. Ortega's whole policy was to destroy the freedom fighters at any cost; and that remains his policy today.

This election is a tribute to the farsighted policy of the policy of Ronald Reagan. Had it not been for his support for the freedom fighters, there would have been no victory in the elections Sunday. The vote by the people of Nicaragua flatly rejecting communism is a repudiation of all those who were willing to deny the Nicaraguan people a non-Communist alternative.

But caution now is imperative. The 2-month transition period to the installation of the new government is fraught with danger. The Nicaraguan freedom fighters have said that they will not disband until a transfer of power has in fact taken place. They are wise to be cautious. Their years of military opposition have, at last, forced the Sandinistas to the ballot box, but Daniel Ortega clearly intends to keep his illegitimate hold on power.

Prudence dictates that it must be assumed that the Sandinistas will dig in their heels and attempt to keep power intact under the new government of Mrs. Chamorro. There are still Soviet, Cuban, East German, Czechoslovakian, and other Communist advisers on hand to help the Sandinistas overthrow the will of the people. We must not forget that the Sandinistas have played host to various terrorist groups operating around the world. That is why Mrs. Chamorro needs, and must have, the help and support of not just the former political representatives of the freedom fighters, but the leaders of the actual fighting groups themselves.

Moreover, it is not merely the new government that is at risk. The Sandinistas have been the main exporters of Marxism-Leninism to El Salvador. They have been the conduit for tons of Soviet and East bloc arms flowing to the Salvadoran guerrillas, the FMLN. And they have also provided training, logistics, communications, and even rest and recreation for the guerrillas in El Salvador. The bloody November offensive of the FMLN in El Salvador was "Made in Nicaragua." There is no reason to doubt that the Sandinistas will accelerate deliveries of weapons in the 2 months of power before the shift in the Presidency. Having been rejected by the people in Nicaragua, the Sandinistas must not be allowed to negate the election by deviously imposing more suffering on the people of El Salvador.

So, Mr. President, the United States should think twice about lifting sanctions or providing other actions of support, unless and until certain benchmarks are met. For example:

First, all current officials of the Sandinista Party must be removed from positions of power in the new government.

Second, no cabinet posts should be conceded to the Sandinista Party [FSLN], especially the Ministries of Defense and Interior, or to any members of either the Communist Party or the Socialist Party of Nicaragua.

Third, the party-controlled armed forces, the so-called Popular Sandinista Army [EPS] should be disbanded, and a new armed forces, about one-third the size, should be organized under control of the new government, as in Panama. The new government should seize the Soviet arms now held by the EPS, and sell them to the United States to raise immediate cash flow. These weapons could be sent by the United States to freedom fighters elsewhere, such as UNITA in Angola, the Mujahidin in Afghanistan, and the Salvadoran Army.

Fourth, the secret police [MINT] of the Ministry of the Interior should be disbanded.

Fifth, prominent and competent members of the exile community from the major parties and from the private sector, as well as members of the Nicaraguan Resistance fighting forces should be invited to participate in key posts in the Cabinet.

Sixth, international observers must monitor all weapons depots and movements of weapons during the next 2 months. No weapons should be sent to El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Colombia, or Peru, with special caution that hand-held, heat-seeking missiles, such as the SA-7, not fall into the hands of Communist terrorists in those countries.

Seventh, all other support facilities now in Nicaragua that have been strengthening the hands of guerrillas in El Salvador and terrorist movements elsewhere should be dismantled immediately, including training bases and communications headquarters.

Eighth, all foreign military and civilian advisers must leave Nicaragua during the transition period, including Soviet, East German, Czechoslovakian, and Cuban personnel.

In the United States, we are accustomed to assuming that elections anywhere are in fact a transfer of power. But in Communist countries, such as Nicaragua, the real power is never in the organs of the State, but in the organs of the Communist Party. Whereas Americans think of political parties as free, voluntary organizations within the State, Communist doctrine holds that the people's will is expressed in the Communist Party first of all, while the government is one of the party's secondary instruments.

In Nicaragua, it was the Sandinista Party—the Sandinista National Liberation Front—[FSLN]—that brought about the revolution, and imposed its will on the country. Today the Sandinista Party is still controlled by the nine-man military junta which has not been, and never will, be elected by the people. As Communist Parties all over the world adapt to the pressure of the people everywhere for a multiparty State, they continue to use the organs of the party organization to control the government, even when the Party changes its name. In Nicaragua, there can never be peace, and there can never be fundamental reform of the social and economic system unless all Sandinista, Marxist, and Communist ideologies are removed from decision-making posts.

In Nicaragua today, there are 65,000 active troops in the Communist Sandinista Armed Forces. This is by far the largest in Central America. The armed forces are not a part of the Nicaraguan Government—they are an instrument of the Communist Sandinista Party. That is the case today, and will continue to be, unless the new government acts promptly to change the situation. This army has received over $5 billion in assistance in military aid from the Soviet Union—as compared to the $227 million that the Nicaraguan freedom fighters received from the United States. This is an armed force that has received the most modern Soviet weapons, such as:

Tanks and self-propelled guns, such as the T-54 tank and the 122mm artillery guns;

Light armor, such as the PT-76 amphibious tank and BMP armored personnel carriers;

Missile attack boats;

Attack helicopters, such as the MI-8 and the MI-17 HIP assault helicopters, and the MI-25/35 HIND attack helicopter gunships;

Surface-to-air missiles, such as the shoulder-launched SAM-7, which are used for air defense, and some mobile SAM launchers.

In 1989, in the 8-month period preceding the election, the Bush administration disclosed that the Soviet Union had shipped 12,000 tons of war-fighting materiel.

But the regular army in Nicaragua is by no means the only problem. The Sandinistas have built a reserve army of 200,000—again one of the largest in all of Latin America—organized in local militias. Again, these local militias have been armed with the most modern Soviet weapons, and these militias exist in every locality.

Finally, there is the third force which is the smallest—but the most important. These are the troops [MINT] of the Ministry of Interior—some 5,000 highly trained and deeply motivated Communist agents, ruthlessly dedicated to the survival of Sandinista communism. This is the type of forces we have seen in operation in other Communist countries in transition—in Romania, in Georgia, in Armenia, in Azerbaijan. We must assume that, in Nicaragua, these forces are likewise prepared to perpetrate murder and destruction for the survival of Marxist power. The Nicaraguan secret police operate in every block, in every work place, in every school, in every organization. They have at their disposal groups of paramilitary gangs trained to harass individuals and break up peaceful gatherings.

President Chamorro would do well to examine what she is inheriting. The last thing she needs is a stable full of Trojan Horses poised to undermine and destroy the hope of freedom for which the Nicaraguan people overwhelmingly voted this past Sunday.

As long as the Sandinista Party controls these forces, Ortega has an enormous bargaining tool to demand cabinet posts and government control of the economy. The mere changing of the head of government will have little impact on these forces, which are deep-rooted in the Communist society, unless the Sandinista command-and-control system is broken.

There is no surprise in the postelection statements of the arrogant and devious Mr. Ortega. The depth of this problem was revealed in the statement by feared Tomas Borge, director of the secret police—as Minister of Interior—in a speech on February 7:

> This electoral coalition [UNO] cannot govern because there have been deep transformations in Nicaragua that it would try to reverse, causing serious social consequences.
> For example, with the existing Revolutionary Armed Forces—EPS [Sandinista Peoples' Army] and the MINT [Interior Ministry]—how can the officers obey harebrained orders imparted by those who are appointed [by UNO] as ministers of defense and the interior?
> Since these structures are revolutionary, UNO will attempt to destroy them, causing chaos in Nicaragua. This would be a country without a government.

What Borge meant is that the revolutionary command structure will refuse to obey the new Government. And he was correct—the Government will have no countervailing force, unless the freedom fighters of the Nicaraguan Resistance are brought in to the country to defend the people against the Sandinista revolutionary power. Borge was candid in predicting at least passive resistance to the disbanding of Sandinista power, and perhaps military resistance to the Government—he used the term "chaos." After all, the Communist Sandinistas have armed not only the 65,000 regular troops, but also the 200,000 trusted cadres throughout the country. By using the threat of chaos, Borge is warning that the Sandinistas will bargain to retain substantial control over the Government and the countryside.

If that is allowed to happen, the stunning result of this past Sunday's election—when the people of Nicaragua so emphatically stated their disgust of communism—that stunning result will have been reversed and negated.

It must not be allowed to happen.

VISIT OF CHIEF MINISTER MANGOSUTHU G. BUTHELEZI, SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today I had a delightful chat with Chief Minister Mangosuthu G. Buthelezi of South Africa who is currently in this country for a short, private visit. This morning he had a personal meeting with President Bush, and this afternoon met with Secretary of State Baker before leaving for the west coast.

Unfortunately, this brief visit prevented a number of Senators from visiting with and hearing Chief Minister Buthelezi's message as an authentic leader of South African opposition forces. I take the floor to discuss Dr. Buthelezi's role in the immediate and long-term future of the Republic of South Africa. Senators HATCH, SYMMS, THURMOND, MACK, WALLOP, MCCLURE, and BURNS joined me in a luncheon meeting today and have indicated their strong support for the statement I am about to make.

In the opinion of this and other Senators, Chief Minister Buthelezi is a highly credible political leader. Recently, there has been much excitement and speculation accompanying the release of Nelson Mandela from prison. Many Americans incorrectly believe that Mr. Mandela, almost alone, is the voice for antiapartheid South Africans, but that is not accurate.

Mr. President, the truth of the matter is that South Africa is an extremely diverse country. Recent courageous actions by South Africa's President, F.W. de Klerk, have suddenly and dramatically opened the door to reform and negotiations. If reform and negotiations succeed, and I believe that all responsible Americans believe they must, and I believe that South Africa will simultaneously achieve a more representative government and the end of the discriminatory system known as apartheid.

Talks about talks are already taking place. But to accomplish the necessary ends, every segment of South African opinion will need a place at the table. Chief Minister Buthelezi heads the Zulu nation. The 7 million Zulus, organized politically in the Inkatha movement, have a cohesiveness and moderate political program. They deserve an important place in negotiations about South Africa's future.

Dr. Buthelezi has been a strong advocate for decades of a new system providing liberty and opportunity for all. Inevitably, Dr. Buthelezi believes such goals can be achieved only through a multiparty system, by protecting property and other fundamental rights, and by encouraging a free market economic system. His presence in negotiations provides important counterpoint to organizations drenched in the rhetoric of the South African Communist Party.

As a leader in South Africa, Chief Minister Buthelezi is second to none. Following President de Klerk's state visit, I believe it would be entirely appropriate for Dr. Buthelezi to return, and perhaps to travel with Nelson Mandela.

Certainly, a variety of other communities, parties, and factions will require representation in negotiations—if they are to succeed. Americans cannot determine who should negotiate, but we advocate that they be completely inclusive.

In the meantime, Chief Minister Buthelezi's moderate message should be heard by the American people and others throughout the world. He is always welcome to return to the United States.

One final element should be mentioned, Mr. President. Chief Minister Buthelezi opposed wrong-headed punitive sanctions imposed by the Reagan administration and this Congress on the people of South Africa. But sanctions have been the law of the land since 1986.

Recent events in South Africa have deeply disturbed many advocates of punitive sanctions. They never believed that the South African Government would move so sweepingly. Prime Minister Thatcher has responded to South Africa's courage by lifting punitive sanctions totally. This Senator commends that action, it is entirely appropriate.

Even if American sanctions remain in force for a while longer, Mr. President, this Senator believes that effective, visible, and public U.S. political encouragement should be given to get on with reform and negotiations. In this context, Chief Minister Buthelezi's responsible message needs to be heeded and his leadership needs to be recognized, frequently and publicly.

UTAH—HOME OF BEST DRIVING AND GREATEST SCENERY IN AMERICA

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, Car and Driver magazine has discovered something that I have been telling my colleagues for years: Utah has some of the best driving and greatest scenery in America. The January 1990 issue of Car and Driver named two Utah highways, U.S. 89 and State Road 12, among the 10 best driving roads in the Nation. Of all the roads in America, this famous automotive magazine has chosen the 10 best, and 2 of these are in Utah.

The article, written and photographed by Larry Griffin, names the entire 2,000 miles of U.S. 89, from Canada to the Mexican border, as a great driving highway. In truly poetic style, Mr. Griffin captures the feel of the great West that I love. He says that U.S. 89 "traverses the True West, clean and pure and strung with parks and forests that still set the tone for the region. * * * The road strides across the expanses and the heights and the depths of the giant ripples and the plush textures and colors of the ranges like an overinked illustration for an 1890 dime novel."

Nearly 400 miles of this great American road traverse my State of Utah and I, too, have felt inspired by it. In fact, I often tell people who want to learn about Utah to drive this road. Driving it will give you a good understanding of what Utah is. In addition to its own beauty, U.S. 89 provides the best access to Utah's five beautiful national parks.

The second Utah road among the 10 best is Utah State Road 12. This road leaves U.S. 89 and climbs through Red Canyon to Bryce Canyon National Park. From there, it winds through the Dixie National Forest and Bureau of Land Management lands until it finishes at Torrey on Utah 24 just outside Capitol Reef National Park. But, I will let Mr. Griffin describe Utah State Road 12 for you. He says:

> Stirring is as stirring does, and Utah 12 churned us like an atomic blender. It stands almost unequaled as a road with something for everyone. The early giant slalom fed, in no order we'd be able to verity in our later daze, into a canyon rip; a Virginia reel; a coastering slew through outsize range cattle and garishly golden aspens; a sensuous slither through an erogenous zone of rocks that loomed suggestively in the softening light, and—gad, don't breathe—a set of esses floating atop the teetery spine of a mountain that falls away without a prayer or shoulders or guardrails. Hand a wheel or trip over your tires and you may well mate with the rocks far, far below. Take the plunge and you're guaranteed to be spread around like hot peanut butter and jelly over hard rolls.

Mr. President, I would like to invite all my colleagues to come to Utah and try that one for themselves. But perhaps my colleagues will indulge me in one more quote from Car and Driver: "Understand about Utah: it may be our most spectacular State. Scenic glitter abounds in the remaining 49 States, some of it marvelous, but nowhere in our recollection is a State packed with more stellar sites and ohwows than Utah." Those are their words, not mine, though I completely agree.

THE 1-YEAR ANNIVERSARY OF THE ALAR SCARE

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, today is the 1st year anniversary of the events which led to the removal of the chemical "alar" from the marketplace. I am not here, however, to recount those events. Instead, I am here to reiterate the importance all citizens, and in particular government, must place on food safety. Further, I wish to enlist the support of my colleagues for the important measures that have been implemented or proposed to prevent a recurrence of another unwarranted and economically devastating food safety situation.

The U.S. food supply is the safest in the world. This past year, however, a number of food scares have alarmed consumers and drawn attention to food regulatory laws and programs. Heightened public awareness of food quality has significantly increased the importance of food safety to government, farmers, and the consumer alike. While consumer advocacy groups have been the most vocal group on the subject of food safety, I wish to point out that they are certainly not alone in their concern.

Last fall, the agricultural chemical industry demonstrated its commitment to a safe food supply when it voluntarily asked the EPA to restrict the use of EBDC's, a fungicide used on more than 40 crops. This restriction will remain until a market-based study can be completed that will help scientifically determine the risk associated with the use of EBDC's. In addition, economically viable ways to reduce the use of chemicals have been adopted by farmers throughout the country by means of such recognized methods as integrated pest management.

Government, too, has addressed the issue of food safety. In his budget, President Bush requested $118 million for food safety programs. The President's proposal would provide $25 million for a multiagency effort to collect and analyze residue data regarding actual exposure levels in the U.S. food supply.

The President has also recognized the opportunities available to researchers to solve increasingly complex agricultural problems. Thus, the President has proposed spending $100 million to fund the first year of the National Initiative for Research on Agriculture, Food, and Environment.

Mr. President, Washington State grows nearly half of the Nation's apples. Therefore, it is fitting that President Bush has included funds for the much needed construction of a replacement Agricultural Research Service laboratory in Yakima, WA, located near the heart of apple country. The mission of the laboratory will concentrate on developing alternative techniques of biological control for crop pests, research the fate of pesticides, and develop quarantine treatments to help increase exports of fruits and vegetables. Not only will this lab play a significant role in food safety, but will be of paramount importance for U.S. trade.

Clearly, Government's role is more than just regulatory; it must also provide good information to the producer and consumer. Government is the one entity with the resources and systems in place to generate, interpret, and disseminate scientific and statistical information free from the taint of special interests. I believe the administration's funding initiatives further strengthen Government's ability effectively to monitor the safety of the food supply and prevent a repeat of the alar scare.

Food safety has not escaped notice in Congress, either. In addition to an administration proposal, two other food safety bills have been introduced in Congress. Further, a food safety title is likely to be included in the most important piece of legislation to be debated in the Agriculture Committee this year, the 1990 farm bill.

Mr. President, concern for food safety does not end when the food leaves the farm. For that reason, I have introduced S. 1751, the Safe Transportation of Food Act, a bill which would prohibit the transport of food in a cargo tank that has been used to transport hazardous materials or hazardous waste. My bill will be the subject of a hearing tomorrow in the Commerce Committee.

Finally, legislation has been introduced to prohibit exporting chemicals banned for use in the United States. I am a cosponsor of this legislation and believe it will help to ensure that imported foods are safe, as well as enable our producers to compete on a level playing field.

Extensive research, combined with appropriate legislation, may not prevent future, unsubstantiated claims such as those that fueled the alar fiasco, but they will further establish a genuine scientific process. Mr. President, unbiased laboratory science is a sounder group upon which to rest our decisions than nonscientific opinions put forth by the media and special interests.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, morning business is closed.

NATIONAL AND COMMUNITY SERVICE ACT OF 1989

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will now resume consideration of S. 1430, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1430) to enhance national and community service, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is the committee substitute, as modified.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we are prepared to move ahead with a series of amendments. We invite our colleagues to bring their amendments to the floor. We look forward to debating them and, hopefully, disposing of them.

(Mr. ROBB assumed the chair.)

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I know Senator MCCONNELL is on the floor and intends to offer an amendment, but I would like to make a very brief statement in support of the bill prior to Senator MCCONNELL seeking the floor.

Mr. President, as a cosponsor of the National and Community Service Act, S. 1430, I support the pending compromise legislation which would provide $125 million to encourage individuals to engage in service to their communities across the Nation.

I have seen firsthand how the kinds of programs this bill would support can help economically disadvantaged youth and other high-risk young people not only to stay drug-free, but also to gain the basic skills necessary to make it in college or in the job market. Last September I had the honor of participating in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania's First Annual Student and Youth Service Celebration at Fairmont Park in Philadelphia. This celebration was designed to recognize the achievement of summer youth corps and other summer community service groups and to kick off the many school and college-based student volunteer programs which would be active in community service during the new school year. This important event helped focus public attention on the impact which the thousands of youth volunteers throughout Pennsylvania have had on their communities and encouraged young people to continue as active citizens.

Pennsylvania is fortunate in that numerous school- and community-based organizations are active throughout the State. A fall 1988 survey by PennSERVE, the State's Office of Citizen Service, showed that 240 out of 501 Pennsylvania school districts have community service programs. The participants in these programs meet a variety of needs within their communities including landscaping public gardens, cleaning up neighborhoods, tutoring and counseling, and providing companionship for infirm elderly persons.

The citizens of Pennsylvania also are well served by several youth corps programs. The Pennsylvania Conservation Corps, the second largest full-time service corps in the Nation, has provided invaluable education, job training, and life skills to 8,000 young people. After a term of service with the corps, more than 70 percent of participants moved directly into private sector jobs, the military, or back into school. The Philadelphia Youth Service Corps and the Philadelphia Ranger Corps provide more than 100 Philadelphia youth with full-time service opportunities as well. Recently, the State has initiated the Urban Service Corps Program in Pittsburgh and in McKeesport, serving 200 youth each year. These local programs are strongly supported by the National Association of Service and Conservation Corps.

Mr. President, I strongly believe that official recognition of the invaluable contributions made by volunteers is a fitting tribute. In this regard, last week I wrote to the Labor and Human Resources Committee chairman, Senator KENNEDY, and the ranking minority member, Senator HATCH, urging that the committee amendment to S. 1430 include an appropriate awards provision. I am pleased that the compromise legislation pending before us today includes the establishment of a Commission on National and Community Service which would be authorized to make Presidential awards for service to individuals demonstrating outstanding community service and to outstanding service programs. In addition, the bill would authorize the establishment of a Points of Light Initiative Foundation, which also would accord appropriate recognition for extraordinary volunteer efforts.

As a cosponsor of S. 1430, I have worked to promote and expand opportunities for volunteer service at all levels of society. It is my sense that there are many individuals who already possess the will to volunteer and that passage of S. 1430 will provide them necessary encouragement and support. The Nation's volunteers have proven time and again that they can make invaluable contributions to their communities. The passage of the National and Community Service Act will help to stimulate new interest in voluntarism and provide new and existing volunteers the support they deserve. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to join in support of this vital legislation.

Mr. President, the national and community service legislation is an important measure and I have cosponsored this bill. There are so many problems in our Nation which cannot be reached by Government that it is absolutely indispensable that volunteers in an independent way undertake to address many of these problems.

I have had the opportunity in recent days to work with a very distinguished group of volunteers in the city of Philadelphia, led by a distinguished Philadelphian, Mr. Herman Rice. This group is seeking to take back the street corners from the drug dealers, to provide voluntary day care services, to provide youth counseling, and, in effect, to supplement what the police force of the city can possibly do.

I had an opportunity to meet with a large group in north Philadelphia recently and another large group in west Philadelphia recently. I commend the activities that Mr. Herman Rice and his colleagues are undertaking in that regard. I mention it because it is illustrative of the vital role for voluntarism and community services. There simply are not enough police to be on every street corner, and not enough child care, counseling, and guidance services available. But when community activity is undertaken, that is really a unique way to move in a very forceful direction and to address the problem head on.

Mr. President, there was an excellent editorial in the Philadelphia Inquirer on a subject called Mentoring, where again it is illustrative of community actions, where citizens are volunteering their time.

I ask unanimous consent, at the conclusion of my comments, that this editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, there is another very outstanding community group called the Retired Senior Volunteer Program of Montgomery County where more than 1,300 volunteers provided nearly 160,000 hours of service to hospitals, nursing homes, shelters, libraries, schools, rehabilitation centers, and museums. At the minimum wage, this would represent nearly $700,000 that the Federal Government and the administrators of these agencies did not have to spend.

I could talk at some length, Mr. President, about this excellent organization, but since Senator MCCONNELL is on the floor waiting to proceed with an amendment, I would instead ask unanimous consent that a letter from Mr. Henry E. Schleicher to me be printed in the RECORD, because it summarizes the activities of the Retired Senior Volunteer Program of Montgomery County.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA,
January 26, 1990.

Hon. ARLEN SPECTER.

DEAR ARLEN: With the current emphasis on recognizing the value of civic volunteerism as an effective means of compensating for a declining ability to provide tax dollars, you may be interested in the work of the Retired Senior Volunteer Program of Montgomery County.

DIMENSIONS

In 1989, this RSVP's more than 1300 volunteers provided nearly 160,000 hours of service to hospitals, nursing homes, shelters, libraries, schools, rehabilitation centers and museums. At the minimum wage, this represents nearly $700,000 that the federal government and the administrators of these agencies didn't have to spend.

Of RSVP's annual budget, only 26 percent comes from the federal government through ACTION. Montgomery County provides another 25 percent, and the rest—more than $127,000—is raised through vigorous action by RSVP members and staff.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS

In 1989, RSVP Montco volunteers served 230 community agencies.

Beyond the regular volunteerism, RSVP Montco has innovated a number of programs which exemplify the programs of national significance being encouraged by the White House Office of National Service:

Talk to Me program provides telephone reassurance for latchkey children. Every afternoon, older adults, many of whom are homebound, talk by phone with a child who comes home from school to an empty house. Innovated by RSVP in 1988, the program has expanded to 12 school districts, with 78 children and 71 volunteers.

Cassette Pal was created by this RSVP to enable homebound and nursing home residents and classes of elementary and middle school children to engage in an ongoing dialog by exchanging audio cassette tapes. Both groups develop an appreciation of each other, discovering mutual interests and dispelling age-related stereotypes. By the end of 1989, 9 nursing homes and 7 schools, including classes of retarded students, were participating.

Senior Adults Generating Enrichment (SAGE) is the newest innovation of the Montgomery County RSVP. Just now getting started, SAGE will enable school teachers in grades K to 12 to arrange for speakers, mentors and field trips with RSVP volunteers. Speakers would draw on their own training and life experience to talk about geography, history, economics, government, law, technology, arts and crafts, and to help with skills development. Mentors will be provided to work with individual students including those with special needs.

RSVP's special programs target community needs:

Volunteer Executive Consultants mobilizes retired managers and professionals to volunteer their expertise to charitable organizations and community service agencies. VEC also holds a number of workshops each year to help people prepare for retirement, to counsel the aging, and to help community agency staffs build skills.

Adult Literacy puts together RSVP tutors with hospital patients, prison inmates, the foreign born, and children who will then read to the blind and frail elderly.

Homefriends provides volunteers who spend a few hours each week with a special needs child—reading, doing crafts, sharing skills, being a friend.

Volunteers Serving the Homebound Elderly is RSVP's support service for homebound and institutionalized older adults. More than 300 volunteers provide companionship, transportation, do shopping, deliver meals and assist with basic household tasks.

RSVP'S COMMITMENTS FOR 1990

To expand the volunteer rolls, especially with the harder to recruit groups of males and members of minority groups.

To create additional meaningful volunteer opportunities for the homebound, institutionalized, and the disabled.

To promote the creative use of volunteer by community agencies.

To service as an advocate for older adult volunteers on issues that concern them.

There are more than 400,000 older Americans volunteering through the 750-plus RSVPs across the country; there are 30 RSVPs in Pennsylvania alone. Their work needs both financial support and encouragement. One important step in the right direction is the effort of the White House Office of Volunteer Services to ensure that all Americans recognize the value being created by volunteers.

If you would like more information about the RSVP of Montgomery County, I'd be happy to provide it. I am an active participant on its board. Also, if you have the opportunity to nominate people to be nationally recognized for their work, I can assure you that our RSVP has a number of individuals who make outstanding contributions. Many of them overcome their own handicaps to be of service to others.

Your interest and support would be greatly appreciated.

Cordially,

HENRY SCHLEICHER.

Mr. SPECTER. As I say, Mr. President, the activities of Mr. Schleicher were truly outstanding, as are the activities of this volunteer civic group.

One of the important aspects of the legislation which is pending is a program to give recognition to individuals who have made outstanding voluntary contributions. Last week, I had occasion to meet with Mr. Robert Field and Mr. Mel Allen of Lancaster to hear about a program which they are undertaking in the city of Lancaster on a voluntary basis to aid underprivileged youngsters. These comments could be extended very materially, but I mention these programs to give some recognition of the very valuable contributions community service organizations can make. As these few instances illustrate, the contributions of volunteers in this country are worthy of recognition and support. I believe that this legislation will be a significant advance of this very important kind of community activity.

I thank the Chair, I thank my colleague from Kentucky, and I yield the floor.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Dec. 16, 1989]

MENTORING: THE NEXT GENERATION OF PHILADELPHIANS NEEDS HELP—MAYBE FROM YOU

Nick Wahl threw more gutterballs than strikes a few days ago at Boulevard Lanes, as his Big Brother—Lee Fisher—offered tips, such as how to stride less like a gazelle. But the low score didn't matter because their get-togethers aren't about scoring points. The idea is for Nicholas, 10, an only child who lives with his mother, to know an older guy he likes, trusts and looks up to. For more than a year now, Lee Fisher, 43, has filled the bill. At least once a week, they get together, often just hanging around the Fisher house.

These fellows are the picture of steadiness, not trendiness. After all, Lee Fisher has been a Big Brother since 1971, helping five boys. And the Big Brother/Big Sister Association of Philadelphia celebrates its 75th anniversary next year.

Yet these one-on-one relationships—also called "mentoring"—are becoming downright trendy. President Bush touts them. A new nonprofit group called Philadelphia Futures is creatively expanding their numbers. Another sign that mentoring is hot and that 1980s-style greed is not: Some of the stars of thirtysomething are doing a public-service spot that will urge local viewers to help Philadelphia Futures.

Thus as the Helmsley-Boesky era ends, the fresh interest in serving youth is a reason for hope. Although there's no magic cure to the multiple problems of young people, especially in inner-city ghettos, one-on-one relationships can help kids in terms of maturity, academics and other challenges of adolescence. For example, one of Lee Fisher's Little Brothers—a teenager who had seemed unaffected by their relationship—stunned him one day by saying Lee probably was the difference between going to jail and going to college.

The big question is this: Can the number of these mentoring relationships be dramatically increased without trivializing the concept? Basically, Philadelphia Futures is trying to show that it can be done. So far, this new kid on the block is succeeding in terms of numbers, but it's too soon to judge the impact on the kids.

Let's look at the numbers. There are two organizations in Philadelphia that are affiliated with the national Big Brothers/Big Sisters. Altogether, they created about 200 one-on-one relationships in the last year (while overseeing hundreds of matches started earlier). Since January, Philadelphia Futures created more than 150 mentoring relationships. That's an impressive start.

One way Philadelphia Futures has pulled in new volunteers is by sheer pushiness. Its founder, Merciene S. Mattleman, employs a range of roles, from a fence-painting Tom Sawyer to a press-agent-from-hell. And instead of waiting for volunteers to trickle in one by one, she succeeded at involving whole organizations, such as CMS Financial Services and the Pennsylvania Institute of Certified Public Accountants. Her program also has a lure for volunteers who might not feel up to the challenges of a one-on-one relationship: They can interact with kids in a group setting in school, which need not lead to a one-on-one relationship but often does.

One of the basic distinctions of Philadelphia Futures is that it's aimed at adults who feel they don't have enough time to meet with a kid once a week. The minimum commitment of a mentor in this program is to meet with the young person at least once a month, make contacts such as phone calls in between, and stick with it for at least a year. Some participants go way beyond that, of course, but many do not.

Research and common sense make the same point about these relationships: The more frequent the get-togethers, and the longer the tie lasts, the more likely the young person will benefit. But the countervailing reality is that there aren't nearly enough volunteer mentors to meet the need. In the Big Brother/Big Sister programs in Philadelphia and its suburbs, for every three kids being helped, one boy or girl is on a waiting list. The need for more volunteers—which is especially acute for black and Hispanic adults—shows why it's important to test the impact of relationships less intense than weekly get-togethers.

This is shaping up as a time of creative competition for mentoring efforts in Philadelphia (home of the national headquarters of Big Brother/Big Sister of America). One hope is that Philadelphia Futures' excellent performance at recruitment will prod the established organizations to do better on that front. The big unknown is whether it's less time-consuming mentoring—a key to luring volunteers among thirtysomething workaholics—will do much good.

Ideally, all of the organizations that do mentoring—and there are many—will benefit from a new degree of competition, innovation and cooperation. If that happens, the real winners will be thousands of kids who need help now.

AMENDMENT NO. 1269

(Purpose: To provide certain protections from civil liability to volunteers and nonprofit corporations under section 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986)

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, shortly I will be sending to the desk an amendment on behalf of myself, and Senators ARMSTRONG, BOSCHWITZ, COATS, GORTON, GRAMM, HATCH, LOTT, MACK, MCCAIN, NICKLES, SYMMS, and KASTEN.

This amendment, Mr. President, in addition to being supported by the Senators I just listed, is also supported by the following nonprofit volunteer organizations in America: the umbrella group, the National Coalition for Volunteer Protection, and within that group, Little League Baseball, the Air Force Association, the Boy Scouts of America, B'nai B'rith, the American Horse Council, Second Harvest, National Ski Patrol, American Society of Association Executives, General Federation of Women's Clubs, Academy of Model Aeronautics, National Society of Professional Engineers, Big Brothers/Big Sisters of America, National Employee Services and Recreation Association, Credit Union National Association, American College of Cardiologists, International Legal Fraternity of Phi Delta Phi, National Junior College Athletic Association, American Motorcycle Association, International Executive Service Corporations, American Association of Blood Banks, American Association of Museums, Christian World Relief Commission, American Institute of Architects, National Multiple Sclerosis Society, American Association of Marriage and Family Therapy, American Dental Hygenists Association, Railway Progress Institute, Hale Foundation, Human Ecology Action League, Far West Ski Association, Electronics Industries Association, Water Pollution Control Federation.

These organizations, Mr. President, among other things, represent millions of volunteers.

I want to talk just for a moment, Mr. President, about a measure that I am not offering today, one that I introduced last summer. Then I will get back to the one that I will be proposing today.

Last June, I introduced the Lawsuit Reform Act, to reform the "sue-for-a-million" mentality that has gripped our civil justice system.

That bill is not designed to help just manufacturers or doctors—It is designed to help everybody. As a result, it has the broadest base of support of any legislation ever introduced on this subject. Nearly 40 major organizations have announced their support of the Lawsuit Reform Act.

Among the organizations represented in this coalition are volunteer organizations like the Boy Scouts, the Little League, and the American Red Cross; local government groups like the National League of Cities and the National Association of Counties; health care providers like the American Hospital Association and the American College of Nurse-Midwives; professional associations like the American Association of Engineering Societies and the American Institute of CPA's; education groups like the American Council on Education and National High School Athletic Coaches Association; Law Enforcement Association like the National Institute of Municipal Law Officers and the National Law Enforcement Council; and business organizations like The National Federation of Independent Business and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

All of these organizations, with their thousands of members and literally millions of people that they represent, are saying "enough!" of the lawsuit craze—it is time for a solution. And whether the rest of America knows it or not, everyone pays for the lawsuit lottery in our court system. The cost of lawsuits and lawyers is a part of everything we buy and use in society. I refer to this cost factor as the "lawyer's tax."

The lawyer's tax accounts for 95 percent of the cost of child vaccines—at a time when our infant mortality rate is becoming one of the worst among industrialized nations. The lawyer's tax accounts for a third of the cost of a step-ladder. And it adds a surcharge of $300 on the bill that parents pay to have their baby delivered—If they can find a doctor willing to take the liability risk. The lawsuit craze also is one of the principal reasons behind the lack of business-sponsored on-site child care facilities.

It also is the reason why many high schools are getting rid of their chemistry labs—at a time when the need for America to stay competitive in the sciences is critical. In football—that uniquely American sport—the players' helmets are made in Korea. This is not because America can't make a better football helmet, but because no one can afford the risk of being sued.

Mr. President, the lawsuit crisis affects every one of us, cradle to grave at every stage of life. Just recently, a young lady could not go to the prom because her date had broken his ankle 5 days beforehand. So she did what any other red-blooded American would do in those circumstances: she sued her date for damages. To her credit, she at least did not ask for compensation for pain and suffering. This case is symbolic of a national trend—to hire a lawyer and go to court whenever anything goes wrong.

Fortunately, we can do something about the lawsuit craze without limiting the right of injured people to receive fair compensation for their losses and suffering. My bill, the Lawsuit Reform Act, strikes a fair balance between the victims of wrongful injuries and the victims of wrongful lawsuits.

Again, I am referring to a bill I introduced last year which I will not be offering as an amendment this morning.

First, this bill would say that no one can be held liable for the wrongdoing of others. If a person is only marginally responsible for causing an injury, then their share of the damages ought to be proportional with their share of the responsibility for causing the injury.

Under today's law, a person who is only marginally at fault for causing an injury can end up paying all of the damages, under the doctrine of joint and several liability. My bill would abolish the joint and several liability doctrine once and for all.

Second, my bill provides that if you sue someone else and you lose, you have to pay the other side's attorneys' fees and court costs. The same rule applies if you are sued and you lose—you have to pay the plaintiff's costs and fees. This is the English rule. Although my bill is slightly different, it protects the right of truly indigent persons to bring suit, by exempting them from this provision altogether. It also limits the amount of the other side's expenses you have to pay to what you are paying for your own attorney and other costs.

With these changes, my loser pays provision will lessen the number of frivolous lawsuits and encourage people to settle out of court—without depriving anyone of full access to the courtroom.

The last critical area my bill addresses is alternative dispute resolution. With our court system becoming more clogged by the minute, we should be encouraging litigants to use alternative means of dispute resolution. My bill would require the lawyers on both sides of any lawsuit to inform their clients of these alternative methods of solving legal problems.

I would stipulate that, if the parties voluntarily agreed to through ADR [alternative dispute resolution] instead of the courts, the decision of the alternative forum would be binding. They could not go back into the court system to get the ADR's decision reversed.

The main reason today why most people do not opt for ADR, is because the decision is not binding. Either side can appeal to the courts if they do not like the result.

This legislation would make the result final if both sides voluntarily agreed to submit to ADR.

Mr. President, another issue my bill addresses is the problem of illegal drugs and alcohol which causes many serious accidents every year. My bill provides if a person was under the influence of illegal drugs or alcohol and this condition was at least 50 percent responsible for any injury suffered by that person, the person shall not be allowed to get money from anyone else for their injury.

The Lawsuit Reform Act also alleviates the liability burden on local governments by reducing their exposure to statutory lawsuits, under title 42 of the United States Code. Although local governments would be subject to the same rules as everyone else in conventional tort suits, they would no longer be such sitting ducks for lawsuits brought under this Federal statute. At a time when the Federal Government looks to the States and counties to provide basic services, we should not be trying to tie a noose of liability around their necks.

Mr. President, I have outlined what was in the bill that I introduced last summer.

Also significant is what is not in that bill; I repeat: What is not in that bill. There are no caps on damages for pain and suffering. There are no caps on attorney contingency fees. There are no restrictions on punitive damages, while we await the Supreme Court's decision on this issue. Finally, in a major departure from past legislative efforts on my part, there is no fault requirement; no fault requirement in the Lawsuit Reform Act.

I had several reasons for this omission. First of all, fault or negligence already is required in nearly all tort actions except product liability. Second, fault-based standards tend to be controversial and I wanted to craft a reasonable bill, capable of getting bipartisan support. And finally, fault-based standards are being addressed in a separate product liability bill that has been kicking around the Senate for some time.

Mr. President, all of the bill that I just described is, in fact, not what I am offering today. What I am offering today is only a portion of that proposal.

Mr. President, the amendment I am offering today has to do with the real crisis in the nonprofit sector in this country. Exactly at a time when the President of the United States is calling for more participation by volunteers through his thousand points of light initiative, organizations, and volunteers providing charitable services are finding a hard time surviving liability premiums and attracting unpaid workers and board members. My amendment addresses this problem in a comprehensive fashion.

First, it would abolish the joint and several liability doctrine. This amendment says that no nonprofit organization can be held liable for the wrongdoing of others. If a person is only marginally responsible for causing an injury, then his share of the damages ought to be proportional to his share of the responsibility for causing the injury.

Under today's law, a person who is only marginally at fault for causing an injury can end up paying all of the damages under the doctrine of joint and several liability. My amendment will abolish the joint and several liability doctrine for nonprofit corporations except from tax under 501(c) of the Federal Code. I might say, there are certain 501(c)'s we specify. Others are not included, and I will go over that at the end of my statement.

Alternative dispute resolution: Second, my amendment provides a mechanism for nonprofit organizations to look at alternatives to full-scale litigation of a dispute involving a civil liability action. With our court system becoming more clogged by the minute, we should be encouraging litigants to use alternative means of dispute resolution.

My amendment requires the lawyers on both sides of a lawsuit, where a nonprofit corporation is a party, to inform their clients of alternative methods of solving legal problems, and it would stipulate that if the parties voluntarily agree to use an alternative means, ADR, to resolve their dispute instead of the courts, the decision of the alternative forum would be binding. They could not go back to the courts to get an ADR decision reversed.

The main reason today why most people do not opt for ADR is because the decision is not binding; either side can appeal to the courts if they do not like the results. This provision would make the results final if both sides decide to submit to ADR at the beginning of the action.

The third provision in my amendment provides limited immunity for an unpaid volunteer as an individual from liability exposure. To qualify for this limited insulation from liability, the volunteer would have to be, first, acting in good faith; second, be acting within the scope of his or her volunteer function; and third, not be engaging in wanton, willful, or reckless activity.

This provision would shield volunteers from liability except in the most extreme of circumstances. And although I can see that the tort laws have traditionally been considered matters of State law, my amendment proposes a uniform Federal standard which would partly, and only partly, preempt State tort law.

Why have I chosen a Federal approach? Quite simply, every single charity and nonprofit organization looks not to State law to establish and organize itself, but to the Federal Tax Code. Section 501(c) of the Tax Code, to be specific.

Provisions in 501(c) determine what a nonprofit association's articles of incorporation and bylaws will look like if almost every activity that organization engages in follows the guidelines set out in the Tax Code and accompanying regulations. These organizations are like nationally chartered banks in that they look to the federal system for their organization's structure and authority and not, I repeat not, the State law. I believe this represents a compelling argument for a Federal response to the problem.

Mr. President, my amendment would allow volunteers to come forward to offer their services without the fear of putting their home or their assets at risk for volunteer activity which is benefiting society.

Mr. President, people in America are not coming forward to offer their services because of the fear of being sued. Yet, no other country on Earth depends more on volunteer efforts of so many throughout their society.

Let me provide several facts to illustrate my claim. In 1985, a Gallup study showed that 85 million Americans volunteered, giving 16.5 billion man-hours of service valued at about $110 billion. One year later, Mr. President, in 1986, the American Association of Association Executives surveyed their membership of 8,000 associations and found that 60 percent—yes, 60 percent—had a problem recruiting volunteers.

In 1987, Peat Marwick surveyed CEO's six nonprofit associations and found that 28 percent of those surveyed believed that there was a crisis in getting volunteers to come forward. Later that year, in November, the Gallup Organization conducted a survey of CEO's of nonprofit associations and found 20 percent of the CEO's stating that they are losing volunteer participation because of libel fear.

Mr. President, is that fear a reasonable one? One in five of these nonprofit associations has had to face a suit on the issue of officer and director liability during the last 5 to 7 years. Mind you that many of these associations are very small outfits which can hardly afford to pay the utility bill, let alone the fees of expensive litigation.

This crisis in our nonprofit sector has prompted these associations to form a coalition to help them solve this problem. More than 800 organizations have come together under the National Coalition for Volunteer Protection to begin to seek a solution to this problem.

My distinguished colleague from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI] has introduced a bill, S. 520, which provides a limited immunity for volunteers.

The third provision of my amendment is almost identical to the language used in S. 520, and my amendment is supported by the National Coalition for Volunteer Protection and the individual nonprofit associations to which I referred at the beginning of my remarks.

The conceptual framework for this legislation was the subject of a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Courts and Administrative Practice on May 30, 1988.

I might say parenthetically, I chaired that subcommittee back in 1986 when our party was in power in the Senate. I will be happy to furnish a copy of the hearing record for any of our colleagues who want to learn about the crisis in the nonprofit sector of our country.

Mr. President, you would not believe some of the horror stories which this hearing nonprofit brought to the Senate's attention. In my home State of Kentucky, there was a flood in 1978 and the Phelps Community Hospital in Phelps in eastern Kentucky lost all of its communications and closed down. A team of amateur operators was flown in by helicopter. They supplied communications support, and the hospital was reopened.

One of the first messages passed by the ham operators was a 2-page request for drug supplies. The drugs were flown in and all was well. But suppose, Mr. President, the amateur operator, who was a volunteer, stumbled over one of the medical names and the wrong medicine was flown in? This good samaritan would share liability for whatever happened.

In New Jersey, a little league coach, who was an unpaid volunteer, reassigned a 10-year-old shortstop to a position in the outfield. In playing the outfield, a flyball to him was misjudged, striking the player in the eye, and he was injured. His parents sued the coach for failing to recognize that the 10-year-old was a born infielder. The National Little League was overwhelmed with calls by coaches from across the country who were worried they would be sued if they moved a player from one position to another.

One of my favorite anecdotes involves a mountain rescue unit in Riverside, CA. In the fall of 1983, this volunteer rescue unit was called to save an individual who had been drinking alcohol and had fallen off a cliff. The person was severely injured. He had no feeling in his legs, some feeling in his hands, and had a piece of wood lodged in his left leg where ants were crawling in and out of his open wound.

The rescue team had no alternative but to use a helicopter to airlift this individual out. Even though it was approaching midnight, the volunteers provided emergency aid, immobilized the injured person, and arranged for an evacuation. The helicopter flew over the top of the injury site, the litter was attached, and the subject was raised to the top of the mountain and then placed in the helicopter and sent to the nearest trauma center.

One year later, Mr. President, this individual sued and won an $11 million judgment against the volunteers who saved his life.

That anecdote, Mr. President, sums up our current priorities in this area. We are much more concerned about individual rights and litigation to the exclusion of other societal interests.

I think this situation needs to be corrected. We cannot continue to abuse these people and organizations which care enough to give of themselves to benefit their community. These are young people and needy citizens who are benefitting from these volunteer hours.

Escalating litigation and skyrocketing verdicts are threatening to extinguish the American system of voluntarism. Voluntarism is one of our most venerated traditions, and this is an activity which, ironically, President Bush wants to encourage, not discourage, through his thousand-points-of-light initiative. The fear of litigation and the cost of insurance are driving many fine people away from community service at a time when the need for volunteer participation is at its greatest. Volunteers and nonprofit organizations are a natural resource deserving of some measure of protection from the lawsuit liability crisis.

My amendment addresses this issue in a balanced and comprehensive fashion. Mr. President, I have made some changes to the amendment that I am about to send to the desk for consideration. To respond to some of the concerns expressed about this amendment, I have authorized three changes in the original draft that I filed, and they will be reflected in the amendment that I will shortly send to the table.

First, I have limited the scope of coverage to only certain organizations under 501(c) of the Tax Code. There are over 20 different types of 501(c) organizations, and I have only included the most deserving for this type of treatment. There are seven. The amendment will apply to 501(c)(1), congressionally chartered organizations, such as Boy Scouts, Red Cross, and the Little League. It will apply to 501(c)(3), which is charitable, religious, educational, and scientific organizations. The amendment will apply to 501(c)(4), social welfare organizations. The amendment will apply to 501(c)(6), business leagues and trade associations, such as the Chamber of Commerce and the American Chemical Society. The amendment will apply to 501(c)(7), social and recreational clubs, which would include the General Federation of Women's Clubs, junior leagues, that type of organization. The amendment would apply to 501(c)(14), which includes credit unions, which rely a lot on volunteers in rural areas. And, finally, the amendment would apply to 501(c)(19), veterans organizations.

Mr. President, the amendment would apply only to those kinds of 501(c) groups.

Second, I have added the term "reckless" to the standards which are not exempt from liability protection. Reckless conduct or misconduct includes activity which may not be intentional but clearly should not be shielded from liability. So voluntarily engaging in reckless conduct, Mr.

President, would not be included in this amendment.

Third, I have added an exception for volunteer activity which is subject to Federal or State professional licensing or certification procedures. Certain professionals, such as doctors and lawyers, should not be completely shielded from liability to the extent that there are existing standards of care already established for these licensed professionals.

Mr. President, that basically covers my opening statement on the amendment.

I send the amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCONNELL], for himself, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. COATS, Mr. GORTON, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. HATCH, Mr. LOTT, Mr. MACK, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. SYMMS, and Mr. KASTEN, proposes an amendment numbered 1269.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new title:

TITLE IV—VOLUNTEER LIABILITY PROTECTION

SEC. 401. JOINT AND SEVERAL LIABILITY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subsection (b), joint and several liability may not be applied to any civil liability action if one party is a tax-exempt organization described in sections 501(c) (1), (3), (4), (6), (7), (14) and (19) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986. A person found liable for damages in any such action may be found liable, if at all, only for those damages directly attributable to the person's pro rata share of fault or responsibility for the injury, and may not be found liable for damages attributable to the pro rata share of fault or responsibility of any other person (without regard to whether that person is a party to the action) for the injury, including any person bringing the action.

(b) EXCEPTION.—This section shall not apply as between persons acting in concert if the concerted action proximately caused the injury for which one or more persons are found liable for damages.

(c) DEFINITION.—As used in this section, the term "concerted action" or "acting in concert" means the participation in joint conduct by two or more persons who agreed to jointly participate in such conduct with actual knowledge of the wrongfulness of the conduct.

SEC. 402. ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION.

(a) POLICY.—Because the traditional litigation process is not always suited to the timely, efficient, and inexpensive resolution of civil actions, it is the policy of the United States to encourage the creation and use of alternative dispute resolution techniques, and to promote the expeditious resolution of such actions.

(b) ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION OPTIONS.—In any action in which one party is a tax-exempt organization described in sections 501(c) (1), (3), (4), (6), (7), (14) and (19) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986, each attorney who has made an appearance in the case and who represents one or more of the parties to the action shall, with respect to each party separately represented, advise the party of the existence and availability of alternative dispute resolution options, including extrajudicial proceedings such as minitrials, third-party mediation, court supervised arbitration, and summary jury trial proceedings.

(c) ADVISING CLIENTS OF OPTIONS.—Each attorney described in subsection (b) shall, simultaneous with the filing of a complaint or a responsive pleading, file notice with the court certifying that the attorney has so advised his client or clients, and indicating whether such client will agree to one or more of the alternative dispute resolution techniques.

(d) AGREEMENT TO ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION.—If all parties to an action described in subsection (a) agree to proceed with one or more alternative dispute resolution proceedings, the court shall issue an appropriate order governing the conduct of such proceedings. The issuance of an order governing such further proceedings shall constitute a waiver, by each party subject to the order, of the right to proceed further in court.

SEC. 403. NATIONAL GOOD SAMARITAN RULE.

(a) EXEMPTION FROM LIABILITY.—Except as provided in subsections (b) and (d), any volunteer of a tax-exempt organization described in section 501(c) (1), (3), (4), (6), (7), (14) and (19) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 shall not be subject to liability for any tort claim alleging damage or injury from any act or omission of the volunteer on behalf of the organization if—

(1) such individual was acting in good faith and within the scope of such individual's volunteer functions and activities with the organization; and

(2) such damage or injury was not caused by willfull, wanting or reckless misconduct by such individual.

(b) ACTIONS AGAINST VOLUNTEERS.—Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect any civil action brought by any such tax-exempt organization against any volunteer of such organization.

(c) INJURY TO A PERSON.—Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect the liability of any such tax-exempt organization with respect to injury caused to any person.

(d) EXCEPTION.—The protection from liability required by subsection (a) does not (1) apply if the volunteer was operating a motor vehicle or was operating a vessel, aircraft, or other vehicle for which a pilot's or other form of operator's license is required; or (2) the volunteer was performing an activity which is subject to Federal or State professional license or certification.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, there are a number of features included in the McConnell amendment for which I think anyone who is committed to voluntarism and understands the burden that exists for voluntary foundations and organizations has to have some empathy and some sympathy. But the way this particular amendment is drafted, it would go far beyond anything that was ever thought to be included in this particular legislation. I think the membership ought to understand the strongly held views and positions of the Senator from Kentucky with regard to product liability. That is not what this bill is about.

As I understand the amendment, there are literally thousands of organizations that would be covered by the sweep of this particular amendment. Every week there are 20 or 30 organizations that are put on the list and taken off the list of tax-exempt organizations. I know that only a handful of our colleagues are on the floor at the moment, but these 2 700-page books give you some idea of the sweep of this particular legislation. Effectively, this amendment would preempt all of the State laws that have been developed across the country. You would be establishing criteria on the floor of the Senate virtually without any hearings other than what has been held in the Judiciary Committee on a related matter of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI] who has devoted a good deal of time on the issue.

I am not familiar with the kinds of egregious situations that have been suggested by the Senator from Kentucky. Yet, we have not had submitted to our committee, in the course of our hearings, how there were additional kinds of burdens being placed on the various foundations, the various charitable organizations. So we do not have any of that information.

It does seem to me, Mr. President, we ought to review this legislation in the committee, and review it carefully. If the Senator wants some hearings on this measure, I am sure that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, where this particular amendment, if it had been introduced as legislation would be sent—not the the Human Resources Committee but to the Judiciary Committee—would be willing to give it consideration. I want to give assurance to the membership that virtually every consumer group is strongly opposed to this particular measure. I know that our colleague, Senator HEFLIN, on the Judiciary Committee, and also the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI], who has spent a good deal of time on related matters, wish to address the substance of the amendment.

But I point out that this is of great concern to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Senator BIDEN, and other members of the committee, who feel that this matter ought to be addressed by the Judiciary Committee. I must say that in the course of our hearings on this legislation we did not have the indication, based on quantifiable data, from any of the foundations, the voluntary organizations, that this is a particular problem. Effectively, if we accept the McConnell amendment, we are saying that the laws of every State in the country that has reviewed this particular issue about what the liability will be for charitable organizations will be virtually off the books. It seems to me to be inappropriate to take that sweeping step at this particular time.

Mr. President, I know my colleagues want to speak to the substance of this amendment. We welcome their comments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I thank the Chair. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

I thank the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCONNELL]. He has, indeed, put in a lot of time on this. I happened to be listening to his statement in another office this morning about the crisis and the severity of the problem, and I compliment him for laying it out.

The crisis today is partly the litigation, but also many other things involved in our society. But certainly he laid out a problem that I do not think anybody will dispute. I do not dispute that the problem exists; it is real. There are a lot of ways of going after it. Really, the difference I have with the distinguished Senator from Kentucky is his particular mode. I do not claim to have the best answer or the only answer or maybe not even a better answer. But I am compelled to oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky to the National and Community Service Act. The amendment represents both bad public policy, in my judgment, and bad Senate procedures.

While I agree with Senator MCCONNELL's goals of encouraging volunteers to offer their services to society, I disagree with the method he has proposed in his amendment. I disagree very strongly, and I would like to touch on it a little bit.

I believe that there is a much less intrusive way to implement a system that will protect volunteers from civil liability which I support. I have introduced legislation, S. 520, the Volunteer Protection Act, which I believe is a more appropriate way to encourage voluntarism. My bill encourages States to protect citizens who volunteer their services to their communities by providing incentives to the States to enact State voluntary protection laws.

I do not want the Federal Government to start regulating this part of the volunteer community. S. 520 is pending in the Judiciary Committee, and in the subcommittee of the Committee on Courts and Administrative Policy.

The chairman of that, the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN,] has assured me that the subcommittee will have hearings on this legislation in the very near future. My experience with the Senator is that when he says he is going to have hearings he has done it—for this Senator and I know for other Senators. At that time I am sure the members of the Judiciary Committee and any other members, including the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, who served on the Judiciary Committee with great distinction and chaired some hearings in 1986, I believe, or 1985, will be available and can have a complete hearing to approach not only this legislation of mine, but any other legislation that is pending on the subject matter.

The amendment before us is an inappropriate intrusion by the Federal Government into the affairs of the States. It is but a small skirmish in the long-running battle between those who believe that the Federal Government has all the answers and therefore should impose Federal solutions on the States, and those who believe that the more decisions that can be made at the State level closer to the people the better off we all are.

I happen to fall in that latter category, not that I do not on occasion support Federal solutions. Sometimes there is no alternative in a situation. To me there is here.

In the past, Congress has attempted to persuade the States of the correctness of certain policies by penalizing them for not implementing certain specific State laws that would comply with the direction of a Federal policy.

An example of this procedure that immediately comes to mind relates to speed limits. In many areas of the country, including my own, the measure was bitterly opposed. In that situation, the Government attempted to impose its will on the States. The legislation that I have introduced does not attempt to impose certain policy decisions on the States. They do not have to do what we might pass here, but there is an incentive.

Instead, it offers financial incentives for those States who agree that citizen volunteers need certain protection under State laws. I am aware that all States may not follow the suggestions that Congress and the Federal Government make in specific policy decisions, I think rightfully so. Those are legislative choices made by the individual States by their legislatures, by their Governors and hopefully by their people.

I am hopeful that, if S. 520 were to pass, all the States would decide that the policies suggested therein are correct and should be implemented because I believe they are very reasonable. But I do not think that these decisions should be imposed mandatorily by the Federal Government on the States.

Senator MCCONNELL's bill contains three sections. If I were a State legislator presented with these amendments to the State laws I could support all of them. The three provisions are an elimination of joint and several liability, promotion of alternative dispute resolution, and a national Good Samaritan rule.

My State of Arizona has already abolished the principle of joint and several liability. I believe that this was a good change, but I also believe that it was appropriately made at the State level, not a dictate from the Federal Government.

The second provision is related to alternative dispute resolutions, known as the ADR. I have supported efforts to promote ADR in the Federal courts to resolve Federal disputes. I would support my State legislators if they chose to promote and pass such procedures in the State of Arizona. But I would oppose an effort in Congress to impose an ADR on the States from the Federal level.

The third and most important provision of Senator MCCONNELL's amendment enacts a national Good Samaritan rule. The provision is very similar to one contained in my Voluntary Protection Act. There is, however, one important difference. The amendment proposed today unilaterally imposes such a provision on all the States as I read that amendment. As I have said, and hopefully made it clear, I believe that such an imposition is clearly inappropriate and something that I cannot support.

I look forward to working with Senator HEFLIN, with Senator MCCONNELL, with Senator KENNEDY, not only to proceeding with S. 520, but maybe there are better ways to approach this problem.

In my view to mandate something from the Federal level is not the answer. The States need to work this problem through themselves, and we should give them an incentive or at least a direction that we think is a policy or a proper way to go.

I am working with Senator MCCONNELL to ensure that S. 520 or his legislation is approved by the Senate as modified, if it is not a mandatory dictate from the Federal Government. But I urge my colleagues to not approve this amendment today. And if a motion to table this amendment is made, I will vote for it.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. GORTON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I want to express my support for the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky and commend him, as has the Senator from Arizona, for his long and thoughtful work on a very difficult and complex subject.

As most of the Members of this body know, the Senator from Kentucky has introduced on more than one occasion a much broader bill on tort liability in response to what is a clear challenge and a clear problem both to justice and to American productivity.

He has drafted this amendment in a much more narrow fashion to apply specifically to the subject matter of this debate. On voluntarism, the Senator from Arizona points out with great candor and honesty, that he supports as a matter of general policy each of the three elements of this proposal, but simply feels that it is inappropriate to establish them as Federal policy.

That is a forceful argument. It is an argument well worth making. It is however an argument which is rather considerably weakened when the amendment is attached to a Federal attempt to encourage and to a certain extent to regulate the field of voluntarism itself.

I doubt seriously that the distinguished Senator from Kentucky would have proposed this specific amendment on an entirely different subject matter. This is proposed because the Congress of the United States and this body now sees fit to interject itself into the field of voluntarism.

There are Members I suspect on both sides of the aisle here who are troubled by the concept that we should be dealing with a subject like voluntarism in general as against the military at all. I suspect however that a vast majority of the Members of this body, nonetheless, will weigh that consideration in favor of a bill which encourages and supports voluntarism.

But as it is doing so, it seems to me anomalous, Mr. President, to say that while we are getting into a new field, the field of voluntarism, we will not do something which may impinge upon a traditional State effort to limit the liability of both those volunteers and of the organizations of which they are a part.

My memory does not go far enough to know whether or not the Presiding Officer is one of the sponsors on both sides of the aisle of a much more sweeping bill which will preempt State liability laws with respect to product liability. This Senator must announce that he is one of the sponsors of just such a bill. That proposal, that philosophy, has been debated in the Commerce Committee of the U.S. Senate now for more than a decade. As recently as 1986, a significant majority of the members of the Commerce Committee, representing members of both parties, voted to report to the floor a much more sweeping bill, preempting State laws with respect to product liability.

In passing, this Senator voted against that bill in 1986, but voted against it for reasons which are not relevant to the debate here today. This Senator strongly supported the preemption of joint and several liability rulings on the part of the States in that bill and does this year with respect to the product liability legislation, which is before the Commerce Committee and which I am willing to predict will get a substantial majority vote on the Commerce Committee as and when there is a markup session on the bill itself.

So I believe, in summary, that the objection that we should not deal with what the Senator from Arizona regards as highly valued social priorities, simply because this has traditionally been a matter left to the States, falls, while we are debating a bill which I suspect he supports, which puts the Federal Government into a field in which it has not traditionally been involved. That leads us, of course, to a debate over the policy merits of the three proposals which have been made by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, in connection with this amendment. And there, I gather, at least if the Senator from Arizona speaks for a substantial number of Members of this body, there is probably a majority position here in the U.S. Senate in favor.

The first of these proposals deals with that interesting concept of joint and several liability, which simply translated into the language of the street means that if there are two or more parties, both of whom contributed by their negligence or by some other mark of liability to an injury, any one of them can be held responsible for the entire damages awarded by a jury or by a court. Even in the extreme set of circumstances in which one of those parties was 90 percent responsible, and the other 10 percent responsible. Obviously, the goal is to see to it that the injured party is fully compensated, even though one of the defendants is judgment proof or otherwise cannot respond to that judgment.

That question is a troubling one, in any event, for any company, even for a large corporation. Why, what justification is there for holding a relatively minor participant in an accident fully and totally and completely responsible for all of the consequences of that accident? In any event, when one asks that question with respect to a volunteer organization, to the Boy Scouts of America, to a church or other charity, social and recreational clubs, to the seven categories which are the subject of this amendment, it becomes even more difficult to answer, yes, we have to stick it to them, simply in order to see to it that an entire judgment is paid.

Does that discourage volunteer and social organizations? Yes, it does. Does it wipe them out? Obviously, it does not. Does it discourage them from getting into certain kinds of activities which may create a risk of liability? Yes. Does it reduce the number of charitable and social activities which take place? Almost certainly it does. When one goes beyond that to the effect on the volunteer, himself or herself, the problem is doubled or tripled or more.

It seems to me very difficult, in other words, Mr. President, to argue against the proposition that these organizations which we all support, and which to a very considerable degree are the subject of the bill to which this amendment is offered, should suffer from this broad concept of joint and several liability. I say that this is particularly the case when, unless the Commerce Committee members are most unrepresentative of the body as a whole, a majority of the Members of this body will be willing to support a much more sweeping change and restriction of State laws on joint and several liability.

The second provision in this amendment is a mild method of alternative dispute resolution, almost hortatory in nature, but one which certainly every Member can support. The ability and the encouragement to settle disputes without full blown trials is of great advantage to the litigants. It is a tremendous advantage to our system of justice. As a matter of fact, it is difficult to think of any party to whom it is not an advantage, except for certain unprincipled lawyers.

Finally, the national Good Samaritan rule, of course, is nothing new, as the Senator from Arizona pointed out. Many States have adopted such good Samaritan rules on a statewide basis. The justification for doing it here is, first, that it is good policy because it will encourage more voluntarism and prevent at least certain frivolous or unjust lawsuits from being brought. Second, because it is proposed as an amendment to a bill which already deals with voluntarism.

I am encouraged to hear that the Judiciary Committee is likely soon to have hearings on the bill which I am certain I would support, if it were on the floor of the Senate for debate, and which is authored by the distinguished Senator from Arizona. But even if it were, it would only encourage States to do what a number of States are already doing. And what its fate will be in the Judiciary Committee after that hearing is very much an open question.

There are occasions, Mr. President, on which this former State attorney general, while he is delighted to be a lawyer, is delighted to not be on the Judiciary Committee, which seems to take a great deal of time to debate the simplest issues.

Here we have an opportunity to debate and decide on what seems to me to be a relatively simple issue, the inclusion of which in this bill would probably do as much to encourage vol-untarism and volunteer organizations as the entire bill itself will accomplish.

Mr. HEFLIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the amendment that has been proposed has some rather broad and far-reaching consequences that could occur. There have been no hearings on this amendment as proposed in the Judiciary Committee.

There was a hearing 2 years ago on the bill that had somewhat of a similar label, but none of the contents that are included in this amendment were included in the bill that was up for a hearing some 2 years ago. It is rather treacherous to pass legislation, particularly in a complex field where there have been no hearings, and where we do not realize the consequences that could arise from ill-advised action without some thorough study.

Let me say that I am a supporter of voluntarism and volunteer services, and I commend the civic mindedness of those who serve in volunteer capacities. The spirit of voluntarism is a centuries-old tradition which I believe the State and Federal Government should promote and protect.

But in looking first at the doctrine of joint and several liability as it is drafted, and in the language that is here, it would apply to 501(c) tax-exempt organizations and say that joint and several liability may not be applied to those organizations.

Senator KENNEDY, in effect, showed you two books of the list of 501(c) organizations which were published by the Internal Revenue Service, but somehow or another, if you get the cameras on it and show the fine print on each page, there must be on one page some 200 different organizations that qualify, and this first book alone has 783 pages of them.

The second book, which is another volume of the same thing, has over 760-some-old pages. More than 1,500 pages multiplied by 200 or 300 organizations to the page would indicate that the proposed amendment would cover a great number of organizations. You would be granting, in effect, almost immunity as it would apply to these organizations, and I want to go a little bit further when I say granting immunity to them from all practical tort litigation that might occur relative to this matter.

Just to name a few of those who are in it and not to indicate any one way or another, there is a Ossibaw Foundation—I do not understand what that is—and a RFW Foundation, and other numerous ones you cannot figure, but there are also labor unions. There is the American Civil Liberties Union, and there are all sorts of hospitals, universities, and others that are included within it. The amendment also includes trade associations and the Chamber of Commerce, and I assume that would include the opposite of labor unions that still were included in it. I am not critical of this or saying one way or the other, but the point I am making is the breadth, the far-sweeping aspects of this amendment that have not been studied or had witnesses to review and testify before a committee of Congress.

Now, the breadth and the far-sweeping aspect of this is not limited to organizations, but the implication of the "joint and several" section has such far-sweeping language that it does things that I do not believe that Senator MCCONNELL realizes or that others realize what it would do.

I have discussed this with some lawyers and raised this issue. The way the joint and several liability section of this amendment is written and the language that it is in, it says that an organization may not be found liable for damages attributable to pro rata share of fault or responsibility of any other person.

Let me read that again: An organization may not be found liable for damages attributable to pro rata share of fault or responsibility of any other person.

From the lawyers that I have consulted with and the way I view that, that abolishes the doctrine of master-servant. There may be some question here since he has an amendment, but this is a following illustration: if a nurse by negligence gives an individual a hypodermic needle that causes that person to be a vegetable, that nurse is responsible, but the hospital, under the language here, is not.

We all know that hospitals carry insurance. In some hospitals there are provisions in insurance that woud cover the nurse but in some there are not and the issue would arise. They might get a judgment against the nurse, but it would be uncollectible and a person being a vegetable would have to require constant care, perhaps oxygen, for the remaining part of his or her life.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on the hypothetical?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

(Mr. SHELBY assumed the chair.)

Mr. MCCONNELL. First, I say to my friend, nurses and doctors are excluded in the amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. I just used that as an illustration. We can use it for a janitor or anybody else. That is also one illustration. The Senator has just changed his amendment, and I had my prepared remarks based on his initial amendment, so I did not immediately change my illustration. I can change it to another scenario, but it is the same principle.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I urge my friend to address the amendment before us. I make the point the doctors and nurses are exempted.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am addressing the issue of master-servant and addressing the language that is contained in this bill. It has to be that whoever drafted this, in my judgment, either did not know the law of master-servant or was trying to put a sleeper in it.

I have seen a lot of sleeper amendments that have been brought before the Senate and before committees, and one of the standard methodology of handling legislation is to have hearings in order to identify sleepers and sleeper language.

In this instance we have had no hearings. I am perfectly willing to have a hearing on the doctrine of joint and several liability.

This amendment also would, in my judgment, abolish the law of agent and principal with this language that is contained herein.

This could mean that the hospital or, we can say, the university could not be responsible under this language for the fault of its bookkeeper.

Again, in looking at the amendment's language and expressing a need for a hearing in this regard, could this mean—and I think it is subject to this interpretation—that the Government could not hold a 501(c) organization responsible for civil fines for the fault of an officer or an employee in regards to Superfund cleanup?

We have the Clean Air Act that is before us today and under the 501(c) there are hospitals, there are universities, and there are all sorts of organizations that would be included herein that could be involved in polluting the air. Under the joint and several immunity that is granted here in this regard, it would mean that the Government could not bring a civil liability suit for civil fines relative to this. I have to admit this might be subject to a different interpretation, but unless we have a hearing this issue does not get cleared up.

On the issue of civil liability, does this include violations pertaining to price fixing? Can the Government take action to bring suits pertaining to various antitrust provisions? It is in the realm of civil liability, but the way this is written it appears to me that it has such a broad sweep that it could give immunity in many different ways.

The antitrust dispute resolution section here does not seem to me to add much one way or the other. I suppose it is there for window dressing. It says basically that the plaintiff has to advise a defendant party or parties of the existence and the availability of alternative dispute resolution options, including extrajudicial proceedings such as minitrials, third-party meditation, court supervised arbitration and summary jury trial proceedings. But some of those have not yet been adopted by the various States relative to being available. It is somewhat putting the cart before the horse—the issues now pertaining to court-supervised arbitration, minitrials and third-party mediation. Some of these are on an experimental basis in the country today, but basically it is window dressing.

Then we must address the issue of the section which deals with a fine, very attractive term called national Good Samaritan rule. Again, this applies to a volunteer of a tax-exempt organization described in section 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986, similar to the joint and several liabilities section of this amendment. And then this section raises the issue as to whether or not a volunteer can be held liable. Basically, it was originally written "willful and wanton," which meant only international. He amended that now to put the word "or reckless" in it.

But this just to point out the need for hearings: The word "and" between willful and wanton or the words "or reckless" after willful and wanton are very, very materially different in the application of the law pertaining to torts. I am delighted to see he made that change, but it points out the need for a hearing in regard to his amendment.

We have basically over the years felt that tort law should be left to the States. There are several proposals that are pending in regards to issues like product liability, general aviation product liability. There is division among industry and among business groups and insurance groups as to whether or not there ought to be Federal preemption in these fields.

As one person who believes in States rights and believes that the tort law ought to stay in the States said, "You know, every Federal cure turns out to be a Federal plague." And I thought about that, and I said, "You know, that makes some sense."

There are some people that think that the business community has been misguided and may need a guardian relative to the issue pertaining to Federal preemption.

But now I want to address the issue pertaining to the question of injuries and damages where volunteers are present. This, of course, would mean that they could not be held liable for their negligence. It is questionable. I think a hearing is needed to determine whether or not volunteers could be held liable for gross negligence. The amendment gives certain immunity in regards to the issue of gross negligence.

Our laws have been developed with the idea that citizens had a right of remedy for injuries that are inflicted against them. We usually call a person that inflicts injury a tort-feasor. As a result of that, we have seen insurance companies develop that provide various types and forms of liability insurance.

A few years back, the insurance industry wanted to give broader and more fuller coverage—and it was a very commendable idea and it was something that they sold—and they came forward with a homeowners insurance policy. Now, the homeowners policy was primarily for property damage, protecting the house from being burned, but it also included a new provision that gave comprehensive liability coverage when you went and took an activities. In practically every instance in regards to a volunteer, whether it be Little League or whether that be Boy Scouts or anything else, a homeowners policy provides protection against the homeowner and his family relative to any tort liability that might be brought in that connection.

I think we need to have a thorough hearing as to whether or not this is needed. I am not advocating this one way or the other because my main purpose in arguing today is to let the Judiciary Committee have a hearing and let the committee determine the broad sweep of this, let us look into this and be more careful.

But there are a lot of other problems that are connected with the amendment. Some say that there is a volunteer crisis. I do not know whether there is or not. But I think that is a subject of a hearing and that we ought to delve into that issue.

I want to quote a few unfair results that could be produced by the McConnell amendment. This is sort of a superfund illustration. A community discovers that a contractor has illegally dumped medical waste from a number of hospitals in a wooded area, or from various other places, not just necessarily hospitals. The nonprofit negligently allowed this dumping, although claiming that very little of their medical waste was involved.

Under the McConnell amendment, the community would not be able to recover fully from any one of the defendants from the damages and costs of waste removal, because this amendment goes futher and gives some shield, some protection to the for-profit companies and individuals in regard to this joint and several liability in cases where one of the parties, or the defendant is a 501(c) organization.

I could list other unfair results, I think, that would occur. But it appears to me that this aspect needs a hearing. I am the chairman of the Subcommittee on Courts. I am perfectly willing to hold hearings on this. I have never been asked to give any hearings.

But, as I look at this, the breadth, the far-sweeping consequences that can arise in this instance certainly should mean that this ought not to come up at this time and we ought to have hearings to further investigate and to review proposed legislation in this area, including the McConnell proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I do want to say a few words about this because I think the Senator from Kentucky has an excellent amendment. I think he deserves the support of some of us who believe he is doing this country a favor in bringing this amendment to the floor of the U.S. Senate.

I think we should encourage persons who volunteer to make our communities and our country a better place. America has become great because of her people. We have become a great country because we have people who are willing to give of their time to help others without any expectations.

This bill fosters that. That is why I am a strong supporter of this bill.

I believe this amendment will foster increased voluntarism.

Without this amendment, this bill may not be as effective in encouraging increased volunteer activity. It is very natural that volunteers today have a reasonable fear of financial responsibility every time they perform a service in this community. The mere threat of liability is sufficient to stop some in America from donating their time, their talent, and their goodwill.

After all, there are trial lawyers in every community offering—even advertising—to take cases on a contingency fee basis. I would be the last to argue that contingent fees are wrong. I, frankly, think that the contingent fee case is a way that many, many people can afford lawyers. And I have no problems with that.

What really is there, though, for an injured party to lose from filing a case in which an attorney has been willing to handle it for a contingent fee? An injured party really does not have a very substantial way of losing, in those circumstances. So we have lots of lawsuits. Some of them are valid. Some of them are not. But here we are talking about volunteers. We are talking about people who, out of the goodness of their heart, are going to help others within the community, help the community as a whole, the State as a whole, and our country as a whole. And, that will help all of us.

I understand that this amendment is a Federal exemption of tort activity which is normally subject to State law. But, this is a very narrowly tailored exemption. This Good Samaritan rule applies only to individuals. Even now it only applies to individuals volunteering for certain section 501(c) tax-exemptions—tax exemptions given by the Federal Government. These organizations have voluntarily taken advantage of the provisions of the Federal Tax Code. It is not unreasonable for Congress to offer some protection for those volunteers who carry out the purposes of this particular exemption.

Moreover, the individual must be acting in good faith and within the scope of the tax-exempt organization's activities.

No person is exempted from liability for damage or injury caused by willful, reckless, or wanton misconduct. That covers a wide variety of causes of action.

No tax-exempt organization is exempted from liability. Indeed, the tax-exempt organization itself remains free to bring a civil action against any of its own volunteers.

This exemption does not apply to any individual volunteer who caused damage or injury while operating a motor vehicle, vessel, aircraft, or other vehicle for which a license is required. For all of those we can bring lawsuits.

This exemption does not even apply at all to any volunteer undertaking an activity for which he or she has a Federal or State license. For example: A physician voluntarily providing health services in a homeless clinic is not exempt from personal liability if he or she provides those health services in a manner inconsistent with professional standards.

If this same doctor, however, volunteers to serve as a little league coach, he or she should not be subject to personal liability for good faith acts or omissions in that role. This amendment ensures that the doctor in that situation will not be subject to liability.

What we are talking about here is protecting a volunteer for the Boy Scouts, a volunteer for the Girl Scouts, the Little League coach, and countless others who give of themselves to others. We can take this narrow, carefully tailored step to protect and encourage volunteers.

I want to compliment the distinguished Senator from Kentucky for being willing to bring this to the floor on our bill. I think it will help our bill. I think it enhances voluntarism. I think it will save Americans money, and certainly we ought to, under these narrow circumstances, protect these people.

Let me talk just a minute about an aspect of it, the alternative dispute resolution part.

ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION

This amendment also requires that, in cases where one party is a specified section 501(c) tax-exempt organization, attorneys advise their clients of the availability of alternative dispute resolution options.

I believe this is a very worthwhile requirement. Our courts are overloaded. Protracted litigation is expensive. No party is required to use an alternative dispute resolution. But this will encourage more amicable and less expensive resolutions of disputes, and this will help our tax-exempt organizations and the courts.

With regard to joint and several liability this amendment also abolishes joint and several liability for certain nonprofit, tax-exempt organizations. The unfairness of joint and several liability laws has been recognized in many States in recent years: They have adopted comparative liability standards which make sure that each defendant in a civil lawsuit pays only for the damage attributable to his or her wrongful conduct. There should be nothing controversial about this feature of the proposed amendment. It just reflects basic fairness and, again, is subject to all of the narrowness that this amendment restricts itself to.

I also wish to note that this provision does not apply as between persons acting in concert, if the concerted action proximately caused the injury for which one or more persons are found liable for damages.

This amendment, in my opinion, is well thought out, it is well constructed, it is an amendment that makes sense and, frankly, it is an amendment that will help this bill to reach its purpose of encouraging more and more people to get involved in volunteer activities.

It makes sense. And I think to fight the amendment means we are getting on the side of those lawyers who have plenty of lawsuits anyway to bring, under legitimate circumstances, and who really ought not to be bringing lawsuits in this particular instance anyway.

It is narrowly tailored, a very restrictive set of circumstances. I think we ought to encourage this. I think it is one of the prices you pay. I happened to have been a trial lawyer, as I am sure many others in this body have been. I have tried many negligence cases and personal injury cases. I have a lot of empathy with that system, especially the contingent fee system, because it is a way those who are poor or who cannot afford an attorney can come to court. I agree with all that, and I agree with the attorneys who want to protect them from personal injuries and get them proper damages in those cases, but I think it is going a little too far when you say this amendment should be accepted because of any reason at all. It is so narrowly construed that it basically takes care of volunteers in a simple situation that would not make sense to take care of. I hope my colleagues will think about this because it is precisely the type of thing that even attorneys ought to be prospering.

We have been Little League coaches, too. We have gone in there and helped people in distress. Some of us have even been Boy Scout scout masters. Some of us have even been Girl Scout scout masters. I think those type of activities ought to have some degree of protection. Keep in mind there are protections for the person who gets injured if there is willful, wanton, or reckless conduct. I think all of that needs to be said.

I hope my colleagues will look seriously at this amendment. I compliment the Senators from Kentucky for bringing it to the floor. It is like him; it is the way he does things in this body: cautious, considerate, worthwhile, and a decent thing to do. I want to compliment him for it and tell him I am going to support him on the floor and hope others will also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. McCONNELL. I want to thank my friend from Utah. I know for many years he has been a strong advocate of States' rights in these matters. Obviously, the case that has been made here today convinced him that, at least in this particular instance, there was enough of a nexus to the Federal Government to warrant Federal legislation.

I think it is important to remember, Mr. President, that we are talking here about groups whose very existence is authorized under Federal legislation. This amendment applies not to a huge number of organizations throughout 501(c), but this amendment applies only to organizations in 501(c)(1), that is, congressionally chartered organizations, such as Boy Scouts, Red Cross, and Little League; 501(c)(3), charitable religious and scientific organizations; 501(c)(4), social welfare organizations; 501(c)(6), business leagues and trade associations; 501(c)(7), social and recreational clubs, such as women's clubs; 501(c)(14), credit unions, which rely a lot on voluntarism in rural areas; and, most important, Mr. President, 501(c)(19), veterans organizations.

If I may offer, Mr. President, just a couple of observations about some of the comments made by my colleagues on the amendment. There is some indication that this was somehow a new issue; that it had not surfaced before; and that there are additional hearings needed.

I might say that on the general question of tort reform, whether it is product liability or more comprehensive measures, such as those I have supported and introduced over the last few years, most congressional committees have had some hearings on some aspect of this problem or another. On the volunteer part of it, the Subcommittee on Courts and Administrative Practice, which my friend from Alabama chairs, held a hearing on May 20, 1988, regarding Senator Melcher's S. 929—on the Volunteer Protection Act of 1987. The record in that hearing, over 300 pages, covered many aspects of the problem that we are talking about today. So I think this is not a new issue, and it is certainly totally germane to the bill that is before us.

There has been some discussion about laying back and allowing the States to take care of this problem on their own, and certainly some States have acted and some have not. But I would refer to the very hearing that I mentioned, held on May 20, 1988, before the subcommittee of the Senator from Alabama. Gordon MacDougall, who is head of the National Coalition of Volunteer Groups, in response to questions about waiting for States to act was going to solve this particular problem, had this to say:

Many states have acted to both protect volunteers from being named in negligence lawsuits and reduce liability insurance costs for nonprofits. Over forty states have passed laws limiting the liability of directors and officers of nonprofit organizations. About fifteen states have properly instituted nonprofit risk-management programs and/or risk pools to stabilize liability insurance premiums.

He goes on, Mr. President, and this is the part I particularly want to emphasize:

Some of these state laws, though, are dangerously limited. Indiana's law names fraternity and sorority volunteers, the Michigan law names ski patrol volunteers, and the Wyoming law names hazardous waste clean-up volunteers and amateur rodeo volunteers. While we recognize that each state has different volunteer needs, we firmly support a federal effort to design consistent and comprehensive guidelines for state volunteer liability standards.

He goes on to say in reference to the States efforts:

This problem is not being corrected, rather it is being exacerbated by states providing limited liability for select groups of volunteers.

Mr. President, we have historically, when there was a compelling Federal need for uniformity, ignored, if you will, federalism in order to meet a compelling Federal need. Here we have groups that are authorized under 501(c) of the Tax Code. We have groups that are providing an important volunteer service for America. By their testimony on Senator Melcher's S. 929, they have stated a serious litigation problem. Various States are trying to meet the need, but they are meeting it in a way that is inconsistent and is not providing relief. So we have the head of the coalition group on volunteer protection which represents over 800 groups, saying the State approach is not going to work because we are getting entirely different results in each State. Of course, many of these volunteer organizations operate across State lines. Take the Red Cross, for example. The Red Cross has 50 different sets of standards in terms of its volunteer activities.

Mr. President, I suggest most respectfully to my colleagues who oppose this amendment that this is a Federal problem that requires a Federal fix. What we have here today in the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky is a very modest, restrained, narrowly crafted amendment to deal with the problem.

Let me repeat what the amendment does. We are not giving volunteers unqualified immunity. I repeat, we are not giving volunteers unqualified immunity. What we are saying is that a volunteer who, No. 1, acts in good faith; No. 2, acts within the scope of activities of the organization; and No. 3, does not act in a willful, wanton, or reckless way in carrying out volunteer activities should be protected. All three of these have to be met.

We are also stating that the volunteer is not afforded this protection where the volunteer was operating a motor vehicle, aircraft, vessel, or other vehicle requiring an operator's license or where the volunteer was performing an activity which was subject to State or Federal license or certification. For example, doctors, lawyers, and others who offer their services pro bono will be held to the same standard of negligence as they presently are.

So this is a very narrowly crafted amendment to deal with the specific problem that is confronting volunteer organizations across America.

Mr. President, we need to make some effort to be consistent. I know that it has often been said that consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, but, in fact, everybody in this body waves notions of Federal preemption periodically. An awful lot of people in this body support product liability legislation. That is clearly a proposal preemption of State tort law to the extent that it is enacted.

But the organizations the Senator from Kentucky is talking about receive their very life blood from the Federal Government. They are authorized under 501(c) of the Internal Revenue Code. They would not, I suspect, be in existence but for the tax status granted them by 501(c). Further, 501(c)(1) organizations, the Boy Scouts, and so forth, are actually chartered by the Congress of the United States.

It has been suggested that we are somehow tampering with the master-servant relationship. The Senator from Kentucky is certainly not an expert on that relationship, but I believe it is correct that a servant is not a volunteer. He is an employee. We are dealing with volunteers and volunteer organizations. We are abolishing joint and several liability only for those volunteer organizations specifically stated in the amendment.

The Senator from Alabama finally, I would point out, mentioned that in certain suits we are giving protection to for-profit as well as to not-for-profit corporations if they are involved in the same lawsuit. It is the view of the Senator from Kentucky that joint and several is a bad doctrine anyway, and I am in favor of eliminating this doctrine across the board, whether it is a for-profit corporation or a not-for-profit corporation.

I do not know whether the Senator from Alabama has indicated that he might support my amendment if I were to, even in that situation he defined, limit the protection to only the nonprofit organization in that lawsuit. But I say to my friend, if it would pick up his support, I will be happy to so modify my amendment.

The view of the Senator from Kentucky is that the joint and several doctrine needs to be gone for a whole lot of reasons across our society, not just for nonprofits. But is the Senator from Alabama would support the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, in that situation he described, that hypothetical in which you had both not-for-profits and for-profits in the same litigation, the Senator from Kentucky would modify his amendment to bring on board the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. President, that is all the remarks I wish to make at this particular point. I see there are others on the floor who would like to speak, and I will gain the floor later in the debate.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I support the notion of protecting volunteers from civil liability. In fact, I have agreed to consponsor a bill introduced by Senator DECONCINI, S. 520, the Volunteer Protection Act, which has been referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee. This bill is designed to protect from civil liability volunteers who are acting in good faith and within the scope of their duties.

At the same time, I recognize that Senator DECONCINI's bill, and Senator MCCONNELL's proposal offered today, would make significant and dramatic changes in tort law. I believe that such changes should be considered first by the committee of jurisdiction, in this case the Judiciary Committee. We should not be in the business of making important policy changes on the floor of the Senate without consideration first by the committee with the greatest expertise in the area.

While I would like to support the Senator from Kentucky in his effort to protect volunteers from the civil liability that many feel reduces their ranks, I cannot support this change in law today when the Senate, and, in fact, the members of the Judiciary Committee, have not yet reached a consensus on how best to approach this problem.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. May I inquire of the Senator from Alabama very briefly, and then I will yield the floor. On the section of the amendment that relates to joint and several liability, I just want the RECORD to reflect that even though there were general volunteer liability hearings, I do not understand there have been hearings on this particular issue as it relates joint and several liability. I would require whether under section A, except as provided, joint and several liability may not be applied to any civil liability action if one party is a tax-exempt organization as described in this amendment; and that organization, to get this exclusion, would not have to have a single volunteer, would it?

Mr. HEFLIN. No. The Senator was right.

Mr. KENNEDY. So you are creating that kind of exclusion for joint and several liability when it has nothing to do with voluntarism. is that one of the parts the Senator was referring to when he was talking about the breadth and the scope of this particular amendment? That is only one section of this amendment. Does the Senator find that that is somewhat troublesome? That in this first part of the amendment we are excluding from coverage all of the various organizations that the Senator from Kentucky has talked to and they do not even have to have a single volunteer involved? We are just giving them a blanket exemption.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the Senator from Massachusetts is correct. That is what sort of disturbs me in this instance. It is called the Volunteer Liability Protection Act. The third section deals with that, but why put in abolishing the doctrine of joint and several liabilities for tax-exempt organizations? And that is what makes me very suspicious that this is a sleeper amendment. It has nothing to do with volunteers, and the Senator from Massachusetts is certainly correct. You could have a university that might not have a volunteer at all. There are thousands and thousands of organizations that have never had a volunteer, and the issue of abolishing the doctrine of joint and several liaiblity has nothing to do with volunteers. That volunteer section deals with those organizations that are 501(c) organizations under the Internal Revenue Code. So really that first section dealing with abolishing the doctrine of joint and several liability has nothing to do with voluntarism.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, this McConnell amendment is a new concept to me and I really did not look at it until this morning. But the more I examine it, the more I am convinced it is a terrible idea.

It is based on what I believe is an absolute false premise; that is many people are not volunteering because they are afraid of being sued. Betty Bumpers is the founder of a voluntary organization, Peace Links. They have about 40,000 people involved. I do not think anybody in that organization has ever raised the question of whether they would be sued if they worked for Peace Links.

No. 2, as a former Governor, I am greatly concerned that the States be allowed to determine their own tort laws. I can tell you that this amendment is a radical departure. I know of no other time that Congress has tried to determine what ought to be the tort laws of a particular State.

I am not a big fan of joint and several liability, but that is a law in my State. I do not know whether there are other States that do not permit joint and several liability. But we should not, on first impression on the floor of the Senate, adopt an amendment which tells the States, "You are no longer supreme in tort law in your States."

No. 3, the amendment states that plaintiffs must notify the parties of alternatives to litigation. There is a strange one for you, Mr. President. We do not have any way of resolving disputes like this in my State except in court. There is no forum in my State before which these people can go to resolve tort actions except for civil courts.

So I assume the Senator from Kentucky wants the State of Arkansas to set up a new forum with all the costs that that would entail before which people who are considered volunteers, and those whom they have damaged, could appear to resolve any claims for damage.

No. 4, consider this issue of not holding volunteers liable for damages and injuries caused by willful or reckless misconduct. If you are dead, it does not really matter whether you were killed by negligent conduct or grossly negligent conduct. The effect is the same on the decedent. And the effect is the same particularly on the survivors, the children of a young mother—who is now dead and can furnish no further nurturing to her children. These survivors get nothing, for their future support, for their education or anything else because she only died as a result of negligence, not gross negligence.

No. 5, the term "volunteer" is not even defined in the amendment. We are debating a bill which says, in part, that young people can have part of their student loans cancelled by volunteering. This provision, which I authored, is an attempt to alleviate the terrible burden of students who are graduating from colleges and universities all across this country burdened with an unconscionable debt through direct and guaranteed loans. We are saying with this provision that if you want to work for community service you can be paid a minimum wage, and the Government will pay something on top of that in the way of forgiveness of your direct and guaranteed student loans.

The question arises, "Is somebody really a 'volunteer' because he is only making $3.35 cents an hour and could be making $30 an hour or $20 an hour?" Are they volunteers? Do you have to be unpaid in order to be a volunteer under this amendment?

Sixth, what is even worse is the point that was just made by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama; that this amendment applies to every single 501(c)(3) tax-exempt organization in America, hundreds of thousands of organizations, whether they employ or use a single volunteer or not. This amendment has nothing to do with voluntarism.

Then there is the Good Samaritan rule. The effect of this amendment is, if you are a layman, you are trying to be helpful, and you do not know what you are doing, you are exempt from liability. If you are a doctor, or even a lawyer, or a CPA, a chiropractor, a member of any profession licensed by the State, you know what you are doing, and you are trying to perform pro bono work you are not exempt from liability.

For example, I hate to keep alluding to my wife, but when I was a Governor, one Saturday, after 2 years of work, we immunized 300,000 children in one day in my State. Doctors and nurses all across the State lined up to volunteer, knowing that when you give a DPT shot, 1 out of every 300,000 kids is going to suffer profound retardation. Incidentally, I might say not one single doctor or nurse in the entire State—and virtually all of them were involved in it—ever asked one question about whether they were going to get sued. But doctors would not be exempt from liability under this amendment. They are really Good Samaritans because they are performing a service that is in their line of work. They know what they are doing. But you take some jackleg who does not know what he is doing, and he is exempt from liability.

What kind of a perverse result was intended from this amendment on that point? There is absolutely nothing in here alluding to punitive damages, or attorneys' fees and whether they can be contingent. There is nothing covering pain and suffering.

I do not intend to denigrate those who favor this amendment. I am simply saying that this is a classic case of why we ought not to legislate things like this on the floor of the Senate with no hearings, no consideration, and no right or opportunity for people to testify in opposition to it. But I will say this: it would not be any time at all until we would be extremely sorry we adopted an amendment like this.

It is unfair to the States for us to rewrite their tort laws. It is unfair to the States to force them to set up some sort of a forum, to allow these people some alternative to civil litigation.

It is not that it could not be done. It could be. We have done it in the childhood vaccine safety program. If a child suffers an ill effect today from an immunization, we allow them two courses of action. They can go before a commission and try to resolve the amount of damages they are entitled to, or they can sue. They have that option. Here I guess they would too. But this amendment does not set up a forum. It does not set up a commission to hear these claims.

Mr. President, in short, this amendment is fatally defective. We have never done this sort of preemption before. We ought not to even think of starting off on this course without extensive hearings and opportunities for the experts of this country to testify as to what the likely result is going to be.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I want to join in expressing my very strong opposition to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

This amendment involves making fundamental changes in tort law. In fact, it would preempt State tort law by abolishing the doctrine of joint and several liability for nonprofit, tax-exempt organizations. It would require all defense and plaintiff attorneys to inform clients of alternatives to civil litigation, and finally it would exempt volunteers from liability for negligent acts under certain circumstances.

Mr. President, this amendment would open up a very complex issue that goes far beyond the simple issue of tort liability of volunteers and volunteer organizations and would draw the Federal Government into an area which has historically been within the providence of the State Governments.

Obviously a step of this magnitude should not be taken on the floor of the Senate. It ought to be considered and debated in the Judiciary Committee after thorough hearings. I am strongly opposed to this attempt to rewrite State laws dealing with tort liability. I have always been opposed to this and I see no justification for federalizing State tort law any more than State divorce and child custody law. Under our Federal system, the States have historically had jurisdiction in this area and we ought to defer to their expertise in this complex and controversial area.

This amendment raises extremely complex issues particularly when we venture into the area of joint and several liability. Joint and several liability is a well-established doctrine in the law. To abolish it as it relates to certain organizations as this amendment proposes to do, without the benefit of having the Judiciary Committee even examine this issue is irresponsible. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. BIDEN, and the chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. HEFLIN, have indicated their willingness to hold hearings on this issue and examine it and similar legislation. That is the way we should proceed.

Adoption of this amendment would seriously jeopardize passage of S. 1430 and I encourage my colleagues to vote against this amendment.

Mr. McCONNELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I listened with interest to the Senator from Arkansas, and he is, of course, a fine speaker and speaks very passionately on an issue before this body. The Senator from Arkansas also indicated that there was not a problem with volunteer organizations; that he was unaware that there was a problem here. And he indicated an organization which his wife had been involved seemed not to express a concern about this.

I am going to read this at the end. There are a number of organizations that do think there is a problem. I will read that at the end before we vote. But there is an umbrella organization called the National Coalition for Volunteer Protection which includes 800 organizations which certainly do believe that there is a problem. There have been hearings on that subject which I referred to earlier in the debate, raising some of the issues that the Senator from Kentucky is offering to address today. But there certainly have been hearings on the problems. Clearly, Little League Baseball, Boy Scouts of America, B'nai B'rith, and a host of others believe that there is a problem out there.

With regard to the definition of volunteer, I think the Senator from Arkansas or the Senator from Massachusetts, whichever one made the point, made a valid point, and in order to create legislative history, let me read into the RECORD the definition of volunteer that the Senator from Kentucky certainly expects to be applied to this legislation. I read the definition of volunteer from S. 929, the Volunteer Protection Act of 1987, in the previous Congress introduced by Senator MELCHER.

The term "volunteer" means an individual performing services for a nonprofit organization or a governmental entity who does not receive compensation, or any other thing of value in lieu of compensation, for such services (other than reimbursement for expenses actually incurred or honoraria not to exceed $300 per year for government service), and such term excludes a volunteer serving as director, officer, trustee, or direct service volunteer.

Mr. President, I argue that this is indeed a narrowly crafted amendment, not a broad sweeping amendment. It applies only to certain selected sections of 501(c). This amendment applies only to section 501(c) subsections 1, 3, 4, 6, 7, 14, and 19.

Those groups, Mr. President, include congressionally chartered organizations, such as the Boy Scouts, Red Cross, Little League, and charitable, religious, educational and scientific organizations, social welfare organizations, business leagues and trade associations, social and recreational clubs like women's clubs, credit unions who rely on volunteers in rural areas, and veterans' organizations.

So this is not a broad amendment. It is a very narrowly crafted amendment designed to deal only with volunteers of those specific organizations. It also does not insulate volunteers from their reckless acts. And it does not—I repeat, does not—apply where they are professionally licensed; it does not apply where the volunteer who is performing an activity is subject to State or Federal professional license or certification. For example, doctors, lawyers and others who offer their services pro bono will be held at the same standard of negligence they are now.

I understand how reasonable people can differ. However, the feeling of the Senator from Kentucky is that this is not a broad amendment. It is appropriate on this piece of legislation, because this legislation brings certain kinds of volunteer activity within the purview of the Federal Government which has actually chartered, or made possible the existence of, the organization.

Mr. President, there are at least two other Senators on this side of the aisle who would like to speak. I also ask unanimous consent to add Senator WALLOP and Senator BOND as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I ask if there are others on that side of the aisle who wish to speak.

Mr. KENNEDY. We were trying to accommodate the membership. We also want to move along with the legislation, as well.

Mr. McCONNELL. I could not agree more. Senator KASTEN, I am told, is on his way.

Mr. President, I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LIEBERMAN). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, it is now my understanding that there are no more speakers on this side of the amendment. It is my understanding, even though he is not on the floor at the moment, the chairman of the committee would like to go ahead and wrap this up. So I think I will make my closing statement and ask for yeas and nays.

Mr. President, the amendment before us does three things.

First, the amendment says that no nonprofit organizations can be held liable for the wrongdoing of others. If an organization person is only marginally responsible for causing an injury, then its share of the damages ought to be proportional to his share of responsibility for causing the injury. We abolish joint and several liability for these nonprofit organizations.

No. 2, this amendment provides a mechanism for all parties in a litigation with nonprofit organizations to look at alternatives from full-scale litigation of disputes involving civil liability action, in other words, the advocacy of alternative dispute resolution.

No. 3, my amendment provides limited immunity for an unpaid volunteer, as previously defined earlier in the record, as an individual from liability exposure. To qualify for this limited insulation from liability the volunteer would have to be, first, acting in good faith, second, be acting within the scope of his or her voluntary function and, third, not be engaging in wanton, willful, or reckless activity.

Mr. President, my amendment does not do any of the following things: There are no fault base standards in this amendment. There are no limitations on punitive damages. There are no caps on attorneys' fees, punitive damages for pain and suffering; and, no Federal preemption of State tort law except in the very modest way that I have suggested.

Some have said that this is improper somehow for the Federal Government to preempt State law to the limited extent that my amendment would do it. Let me say that the organizations which are covered by this amendment have their very lifeblood as a result of Federal law. My amendment covers organizations in 501(c)(1), that is congressional chartered organizations such as Boy Scouts, Red Cross, and Little League; 501(c)(3), charitable, religious, scientific, educational organizations; also, 501(c)(4), social welfare organizations; 501(c)(6), business leagues and trade associations; 501(c)(7), social and recreational clubs, women's clubs; 501(c)(14), credit unions; 501(c)(19), all volunteers and veterans organizations.

That is what the amendment does Mr. President, and what it does not do and who it applies to.

In terms of the politics of this, it is pretty simple. There is one organization against this amendment, and that is the American Trial Lawyers Association.

I would like to close by reading the names of the organizations in favor of this amendment.

First, Mr. President, there is an umbrella organization of 800 groups called the National Coalition for Volunteer Protection which supports the amendment as well as the following groups:

Little League Baseball, the Air Force Association, Boy Scouts of America, B'nai B'rith, American Horse Council, Second Harvest, National Ski Patrol, American Society of Association Executives, General Federation of Womens Clubs, Academy of Model Aeronautics, National Society of Professional Engineers, Big Brothers/Big Sisters of America, National Employee Services & Recreation Association, Credit Union National Association, American College of Cardiologists, International Legal Fraternity of Phi Delta Phi, National Junior College Athletic Association, American Motorcycle Association, International Executive Service Corps, American Association of Blood Banks, American Association of Museums, Christian World Relief Commission, American Institute of Architects, National Multiple Sclerosis Society, American Association of Marriage & Family Therapy, American Dental Hygenists Association, Railway Progress Institute, Hale Foundation, Human Ecology Action League, Far West Ski Association, Electronics Industries Association, and the Water Pollution Control Federation.

Mr. President, all of these volunteer organizations support this amendment. There is one organization in opposition, the American Trial Lawyers Association; all of these other organizations support it.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask uanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, just for the understanding of the membership about where we are in terms of the volunteer liability issue, the fact is that any volunteer that is operating in good faith in any of these programs is effectively protected against any suit by most, if not all, of the 50 States.

So that aspect, as nice as it sounds in terms of trying to encourage voluntarism, is already protected.

I ask unanimous consent that the outline of the relevant State provisions and a letter from Public Citizen and the Consumers Union be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the outline and letter were ordered to be pritned in the RECORD, as follows:

CONSUMERS UNION,
Washington, DC, February 27, 1990.

DEAR SENATOR: We are told that the Senate may consider a McConnell amendment to the National Community Service Act, S. 1430, that would immunize volunteers and non-profit organizations from liability judgments. As a non-profit organization, and as a consumer group, we must urge you to oppose this misguided amendment.

Individuals, or organizations, whose negligence inflict harm on others should be held liable for their conduct. The fact that such individuals or groups may be inflicting this harm in their capacity as a non-profit organization or a volunteer should not control the outcome of a personal injury dispute. Courts must be free to evaluate the relative reprehensability of the conduct at issue, without a rigid directive from the Congress.

For the past decade, product manufacturers, the general aviation industry, and the insurance industry, have sought federal legislation that would make it harder for tort victims to recover damages in court. Proponents argue, without producing any objective evidence to support the contention, that legislation would stave off the ravages of skyrocketing insurance costs. The crisis in insurance availability and affordability during the mid-1980's was not caused by "runaway" juries. Instead the insurance crisis was caused by run amok insurance executives who engaged in underwriting based on their case flows. When interest rates were high, insurers wrote as much business as possible so that they could benefit from investment income; when rates fell, insurers lost on investments. To reduce those losses, the insurance industry raised rates for all liability insurance consumers and dropped certain higher risk customers.

It's time to end this quest to punish victims for the excess of the insurance industry. We urge you to focus your attention in this last session of the 101st Congress on insurance reform, and defeat all measures that would only serve to deprive victims of recoveries.

Sincerely,

PAM GILBERT,
Legislative Director, Public Citizen's Congress Watch.
LINDA A. LIPSEN,
Legislative Counsel, Consumers Union.

Mr. KENNEDY. Second, Mr. President, I wish to point out that Independent Sector, which is one of the largest umbrella organizations for the voluntary agencies, has commented to us, along with United Way, another one of the very important and largest agencies that is in support of voluntarism. United Way said that if this was a freestanding measure they would be inclined to support it, but not in this context where it would be circumventing the whole procedure of having this matter studied by the Judiciary Committee. The Red Cross has indicated a similar position.

In addition, Mr. President, the fact is that every major consumer group is opposed to it. Many of the most important and significant and well-known voluntary agencies do not find that this is a particular issue of undue concern to them.

I do not believe that the case has been made about the proliferation of different suits against voluntary organizations and volunteers that have taken place in recent time. The case just has not been made.

We have asked the various foundations and organizations for material to sustain it, and they have not indicated that this issue is a problem to them. To the contrary, they believe that the actions which have been taken by the States have addressed their principal concerns.

We will be following this issue closely in committee, as both the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Arizona have stated. It seems to me that this is not the time to effectively preempt all 50 States that have addressed this issue in one way or the other over recent years.

We ought to permit this legislation to move forward to provide an opportunity to study this concept in the Judiciary Committee. Both the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and the chairman of the Courts Subcommittee have indicated they would be willing to address it and, if it has merit, to consider it as a freestanding measure.

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I rise today in opposition to Senator MCCONNELL's amendment which would abolish the joint and several liability doctrine for volunteer nonprofit, tax-exempt organizations. The amendment also would limit the liability of volunteers who injure someone in the course of their duties unless there is willful and wanton misconduct by the volunteer. Finally, it would require attorneys in any civil action involving nonprofit corporations to inform clients of the option of alternative dispute resolution.

The proponents of this amendment say that it will advance the cause of voluntarism in America by protecting those public-spirited people who give of their time and themselves to provide needed services in communities. Let me be very clear that I support voluntarism to the hilt. In my home State of Oregon, volunteers provide every conceivable kind of needed service from providing hands-on care for hospitalized infants to remodeling shelters for the homeless. If Oregon or the Federal Government had to pay for those thousands of hours of labor, many of the services simply could not be provided. Truly, community volunteers in this country are a national treasure and Congress should indeed do everything in its power to recognize and encourage their efforts.

What I question is not the concern of Senator MCCONNELL and my other colleagues for the health of the volunteer movement. I question whether it is appropriate to reform tort law in this country in a very drastic way by means of an amendment to the National and Community Service Act. As my colleague Senator KENNEDY has pointed out, no evidence was introduced in the committee hearings on the underlying bill by any nonprofit organization that fear of liability has kept citizens from volunteering for community service.

Senator MCCONNELL is careful not to use the words "tort reform." He emphasizes that this amendment would not limit punitive damages or attorney fees, or require fault as an element of a tort. Well, my esteemed colleagues, tort reform is exactly what this legislation is. The abolition of the joint and several liability doctrine for nonprofit organizations is a major change, and we would be imposing this change at the Federal level on each one of our States. Joint and several liability is not a newfangled notion. It developed from the common law. Simply put, it allows a plaintiff who proves an injury by more than one defendant to recover from each defendant separately or all of them together, at his option. Some States have abolished joint and several liability; others have chosen to keep it. I personally oppose limiting the number of theories under which an injured party may recover. However, I am not here today to argue the merits of joint and several liability. My point is that in the area of torts, States should and must have the option of determining what theories of recovery and remedies are available in their jurisdictions. What is workable and acceptable in one State may not be in another.

I am also troubled by the standard this amendment would set for recovery against a volunteer who injures someone while performing his or her duties. The volunteer would have to be grossly negligent by the terms of this amendment. That means the plaintiff would have to prove that the volunteer acted intentionally and in reckless disregard of consequences. Any lawyer will tell you that this is a very difficult standard and would pretty much eliminate recovery for accidental injuries caused by volunteers.

Some of the rhetoric in favor of this amendment has suggested that Americans have become very litigious and that failure to enact this amendment will place well-meaning volunteers in danger of losing everything in a lawsuit at the hands of a greedy beneficiary of the volunteer's services. Although anecdotal examples have been placed on the record, what is lacking is any hard evidence that this is a national problem. As is usual with tort reform rhetoric, today's discussion has been long on worst case scenarios and short on statistical proof.

I would like to address the alternative dispute resolution section of Senator MCCONNELL's amendment. It requires that attorneys in civil actions involving nonprofit corporations inform clients of alternatives to civil litigation. Now I'm not against alternative dispute resolution and I think it can be very beneficial in appropriate cases, but you have to have a system set up to handle it. In Oregon we have mandatory mediation in domestic relations cases. I understand it is working fairly well. However, it was put into operation after years of planning and coordination between the court system and the State bar. If this amendment were to pass, Oregon and every other State would suddenly be expected to provide a forum for alternative dispute resolution for tort cases. We in Congress may think that is a good idea, but again we would be imposing something on the States that may or may not make sense for them.

Mr. President, I oppose this amendment in the strongest possible terms, and I will vote against it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in a sort of closing statement—and I intend to make a motion to table—let me say that this amendment takes away long established common law rights. Any student of the law who has studied the development of the common law realizes that it came from England to the United States and has been developed over centuries.

This is really the first effort to bring about Federal preemption and take it away from the States in the field of injured rights and tort law. Many business people do not support this movement.

I remember when I came to the Senate in 1979, there was great fear on the part of business people that they were going to establish a Federal workmen's compensation law. If you get into the field of tort liability and into the field of injured rights by Federal preemption, you open a Pandora's box. And just consider the various consequences from a business viewpoint.

So I mention that to those people who may think that some business organizations are supporting this effort.

I made the argument that the breadth of this joint and several liability section was so sweeping that it had many consequences, such because certain organizations may not be found libel for damages attributable to a pro rata share, fault, or responsibility of another person, and this implication touches the area of master-servant, and principal-agent.

The only reply that I heard was that this section did not apply because those at issue are volunteers and therefore a master-servant relationship did not exist.

But what we are pointing out is that section 1, as Senator KENNEDY pointed out, has nothing to do with volunteers. It is applicable to 501(c) tax-exempt organizations. So no one has given a satisfactory answer pertaining to that question.

There are a number of Senators who are nonlawyers. They probably at this time are scratching their heads and saying: What is joint and several liability? Or what is wantonness; what is wanton conduct? What is gross negligence? What is negligence? All of those are various issues that they may have heard one time or another.

So I say to those nonlawyers, if you do not know what it is and you do not understand it, then support my position that this amendment demands a hearing and let's invite some experts to look at the amendment to determine how far-sweeping it is, whether there are sleepers in it that are designed to take care of a particular lawsuit or whether there are other aspects of this.

So to the nonlawyers, hearings are designed for your protection. Let us exercise that protection.

I, therefore, move to table this amendment and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] to table the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCONNELL].

NOT VOTING—3

Matsunaga	Moynihan	Wilson

So the motion to lay on the table amendment No. 1269 was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEFLIN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, if there are other amendments, I hope that the Members will get them to me. I understand now we are down to probably three or four additional amendments. We have tried to work them out. We have made good progress. We have a considerable Senate Calendar and the leader wants us to move forward expeditiously, so we are going to try to follow his request. We understand that the Senator from Texas might have an amendment.

AMENDMENT NO. 1270

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Senate regarding the use of the so-called "peace dividend")

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk for myself, Mr. HELMS, Mr. GORTON, Mr. LOTT, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. COATS, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. MACK, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. SYMMS, and Mr. WALLOP and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Texas [Mr. GRAMM], for himself, Mr. HELMS, Mr. GORTON, Mr. LOTT, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. COATS, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. MACK, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. SYMMS, and Mr. WALLOP, proposes an amendment numbered 1270.

At the appropriate place in the bill, insert the following:

SEC. . POLICY REGARDING "PEACE DIVIDEND".

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) in recent months dramatic movements toward greater political and economic freedom have occurred in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union;

(2) these democratic reforms may permit the preservation of our Nation's security at a cost less than current budget projections;

(3) the changes in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union are a direct result of the American taxpayer's willingness and determination to pay the price for the advancement of freedom throughout the world;

(4) the changes in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union are also a direct result of the total inability of socialist economies to compete with free-market economies;

(5) the family has been the keystone of the ability of Western democracies to promote growth and opportunity; and

(6) the recent democratic reforms in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union have again demonstrated the need to redirect resources from government to the family to meet effectively individual needs of health, education, training, and nutrition.

(b) POLICY.—It is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) any savings resulting from lower defense expenditures below the level required for balanced fiscal restraint to meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit targets and to achieve a balanced budget should be returned to America's taxpayers;

(2) only by returning defense savings to American families to invest in their futures and, thus, America's future can the United States assure that the "peace dividend" will be wisely invested; and

(3) savings from the so-called "peace dividend" should be returned to the American taxpayer in the form of measures such as a refundable child care tax deduction, repeal of the Social Security earnings test, an increase in the personal exemption, expansion of a permanent research and development tax credit, a long-term capital gains tax cut, further lowering of marginal tax rates, and other savings and investment incentives.

AMENDMENT NO. 1271 TO AMENDMENT NO. 1270

(Purpose: To state the sense of the Senate on the uses of the peace dividend)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator SASSER, myself, and others, I send to the desk an amendment in the second degree and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], for Mr. SASSER (for himself, and Mr. KOHL), proposes an amendment numbered 1271 to amendment 1270:

Strike all after the word "SEC. 17." in the pending amendment and insert the following:

POLICY REGARDING "PEACE DIVIDEND".

(a) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—

(1) in recent months, dramatic movements toward greater political and economic freedom have occurred in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union; and

(2) these democratic reforms will permit the preservation of our Nation's security at a cost less than current budget levels.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that funds saved as a result of reductions in military expenditures shall be used for—

(1) balancing the budget, without resorting to use of the Social Security surpluses, in order to stop the ongoing "thievery" and "embezzlement" from the Social Security Trust Funds;

(2) urgent national priorities, including investing in America's future, anti-drug and anti-crime efforts, education, health care, the environment, rebuilding the infrastructure, assisting emerging democracies, and other critical needs;

(3) tax reductions for working men and women.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, as we have all looked at what is happening in Eastern Europe and as we have assessed its impact on us, naturally our primary attention has been on the fact that the events in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union represent dramatic changes that will make for a more secure and peaceful world, and the impact of that obviously is going to be felt by every man, woman, and child in the world. However, other than in caucus meetings of the two parties that control the House and Senate, there has not been any real discussion about the impact of the collapse of the Soviet empire on defense spending and in turn on the budget of the American Government and on the relative priority usage of resources in the American economy.

Mr. President, to this point there has been only one real proposal as to what to do with the peace dividend, and that proposal has been to spend it. The White House has taken the view that there is not a peace dividend; that it is too early to talk about a peace dividend; that we do not want to declare a dividend before the money is in the bank. They clearly have concern that if a fever pitched debate should occur over the so-called peace dividend, there will be a natural incentive to cut defense beyond the bounds that would be dictated by reason and by the remaining threat, and that this would undercut our ability to negotiate conventional and nuclear arms reductions with the Soviet Union.

Mr. President, I am in agreement with the White House that it is too early to declare a peace dividend based on Soviet words; that to this point while we are very encouraged and I believe will be successful in our negotiations, these words are not matched by Soviet deeds.

I believe it is not too early to begin to debate in earnest as to what is going to be done with the resources that will be freed as a result of the dramatic changes that are occurring in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. In fact, Mr. President, I do not believe it is too dramatic to say that the No. 1 issue in the 1990's, if things continue to move in the current direction in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, will be what to do with the peace dividend.

As we have seen from a substitute that has been offered here today, this is not a normal debate concerning a sense-of-the-Senate resolution. I offered this one today because I believe it is imperative for the American people to hear that there is an alternative in using the peace dividend other than having the Federal Government spend it.

I would like to begin by talking about opportunities that have existed in the past which have been taken and have been used productively and those which have not. I will start by talking about the post-World War I, post-World War II period. The periods after World War I and World War II basically were periods whereby we reordered priorities, we reduced the scope of Federal expenditures, and in the process we returned to the American worker and the American taxpayer the resources we had taken to fight the war. For example, in 1917, 1 percent of GNP was going into defense. That rose to a peak of 16.1 percent in 1919, but by 1926 it was back down to 0.6 percent. The Federal Government as a percentage of GNP was 3.1 percent in 1917; it rose to a peak of 22 percent in 1919, but by 1926 it was down to 2.9 percent.

During the war, we called on the taxpayer to pay the cost of defending freedom and supporting democracy around the world, making the world safe for democracy. They responded, and when the war was over, we gave them back their resources. They invested their resources, Mr. President, in their own futures, and in doing so they invested in the future of America.

Mr. President, exactly the same pattern occurred in World War II. Defense as a percentage of GNP at the beginning of the war was 5.7 percent; it rose to a peak of 39.1 percent, but by 1950 it had fallen back to 5 percent. Government as a percentage of GNP started out at 10 percent; it rose to a peak of 45.2 percent, but by 1948 it was back down to 12 percent of GNP, and exactly in the same pattern the American worker and the American family were called upon to shoulder the burden of defending the free world, of winning World War II.

But when the war was over, the resources went back to the working families of America. Mr. President, the pattern in the Korean conflict was similar because the end of the struggle on the Chosen Peninsula with an unstable trust not only did end the cold war, but it really started the cold war. The level of defense never went back to the level it existed prior to the Korean conflict and the size of government rose at the peak of the war effort, fell back, but ended up falling back based on the lack of decline in the size of defense spending.

Mr. President, when we go to the Vietnam conflict, we see a pattern that is dramatically different. I would like to focus most of my attention today in setting up this debate on our experience post-Vietnam.

Mr. President, I think there are few here today in talking about the potential size of the peace dividend who would argue that the dramatic changes we see in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union are likely to have a smaller impact on defense spending than the changes that occurred at the end of the Vietnam war.

It is within that context, talking about the size of the so-called peace dividend at the end of the Vietnam war, the fact that the peace dividend was squandered by government is the focal point of the sense-of-the-Senate resolution that I have offered today.

Mr. President, when the Vietnam war started, we followed exactly the same pattern that we had followed in our previous conflicts in the 20th century. Defense spending rose, Government as a percentage of GNP rose, and taxes rose as we provided the resources for the war effort. But where the unique break with past American experience ended was when the war was over.

I have put together a table here because pictures are sometimes more powerful than words, and I want to go through this picture to give people an idea of the magnitude of the peace dividend post-Vietnam, and the magnitude of the squandering of the birthright of the working men and women of America that made the decade of the 1970's the lost decade of the 20th century for working Americans.

The first point I would like to make is that if you begin in 1970, and you go to 1977, you find that real defense spending fell from 1970 to 1977 on a cumulative basis—that is, if you add up the reduction in real defense spending and you adjust it for inflation—real defense spending by 1977 cumulatively from 1970 was $380 billion less than it would have been had we continued to spend at the real 1970 level.

If one wanted to try to measure what the post-Vietnam war peace dividend was and you looked at what we were spending in 1970, and then what we spent each year through 1977, in essence, over that 7-year period the peace dividend was $380 billion. That is in real 1982 dollars. By 1977, we were spending $71 billion less on defense in real 1982 dollars than we spent in 1970.

Mr. President, you would think that a dramatic decline in real defense spending would free up resources, that those resources would lower the deficit, and that those resources might have gone back to the long-suffering American taxpayer. That was the pattern at the end of World War I, it was the pattern at the end of World War II, and it was the pattern at the end of the Korean conflict. But if you assume that happened, you were absolutely wrong because what happened was as defense spending fell off, nondefense spending skyrocketed. Total spending rose, and the Federal deficit went up like a rocket, as did tax collections.

Mr. President, what happened between 1970 and 1977 is a peace dividend of $380 billion was spent dollar for dollar on new domestic spending programs. The deficit went up, not down. In fact, the deficit during this period rose very substantially, and also during this period Federal taxes rose.

So not only did the Federal Government spend the entire $380 billion of peace dividend, they spent more; the deficit went up, and taxes went up.

Mr. President, my point here is twofold: No. 1, at the end of the Vietnam conflict, we did something that we had not done before in the 20th century in America. That is, when a conflict ended, instead of giving the money back to the working men and women of America, instead of giving the money back to the working families, Government kept the money and they spent every single dollar of it.

Mr. President, what happened to the index of the well-being of the people of America? I think it is interesting, and I do not think it is an accident. It is not the major point of my amendment. But it is relevent that in January of 1981 the average American worker after taxes, after inflation, was worse off than that worker was in 1970. The decade of the 1970's was a decade of lagging growth, falling productivity, declining position of America's world leadership in which the working men and women of America did not benefit from that economic growth which did occur because every penny of the economic growth that occurred was absorbed by Government.

Mr. President, what happened in America in the 1970's is what is happening in Eastern Europe; that is, government does not work, government does not solve problems, and when you take resources away from working people and give it to the government, you make people poorer.

Mr. President, the purpose of this sense-of-the-Senate resolution is to recognize that beginning this year there is going to be a fundamental debate. Make no doubt about it. There are two distinct views as to what should be done with the peace dividend. One view is that it should be spent on Government. And the halls of this great body are full of those planning new programs and new expenditures.

But, Mr. President, there is an alternative. And the alternative is to take the amount of the peace dividend that is necessary as part of a balanced response to our requirement for fiscal responsibility to meet the Gramm-Rudman targets with part of the savings coming from defense growth limitations and part coming from the limitations on the growth of nondefense, but beyond that level of defense restraint to return the peace dividend to the long-suffering American taxpayer.

Mr. President, I do not believe in this year the peace dividend will be large. My guess is it is going to be larger than that proposed by the President. But I do not believe in this year with the tight Gramm-Rudman constraint we face on the deficit that this is the time to be declaring a peace dividend. Also let me say if the lion and the lamb are about to lie down together, I want to be sure that we are the lion. The world will be a lot safer if that is the case.

But I want to put this body on notice. And the notice is that beginning next year there are going to be alternatives to spending money and those alternatives are going to start with the alternative of lowering taxes on working Americans, alternatives such as the alternative to have a child care tax credit so we do not have to have a Federal child care program.

Mr. President, if Federal child care really worked, we would not have knocked down the Berlin Wall to get into Eastern Europe. They would not have knocked it down to get into the west.

I propose that next year we begin to debate about eliminating the Social Security earnings test so that our senior citizens can earn their Social Security and continue to work. Next year, we need to begin the debate about increasing the personal exemptions on the income tax. We need to expand R&D the tax credit.

We need to have a long-term reduction in capital gains tax rates, hopefully adopted this year, but fully in effect next year. Finally, we need to look at lowering marginal tax rates and other savings and investment incentives.

Mr. President, I think it is important that we note that the fundamental issue here is what are we going to do with the peace dividend beyond the level required to balance the budget? Nobody here is proposing that we forget about the Gramm-Rudman targets. Obviously, I am not proposing that we forget it. But the next point I wish to make before we launch into this debate over the two resolutions before us is where we are in terms of meeting the Gramm-Rudman targets.

Mr. President, it is my opinion that the full impact of the peace dividend will probably be felt in fiscal year 1994 or 1995. By that point, under existing law, we would have been required to balance the unified balance deficit, and hopefully we would have moved on to take Social Security off budget, set up a freestanding trust fund, and balance the budget without counting the Social Security trust fund, so that we could have a legitimate trust fund, not just to pay benefits to our parents, but to our children, too.

I want my colleagues to look at this next chart, because this next chart shows us basically where we are today in terms of receipts coming from the Federal Government, in terms of expenditures to the Federal Government; and basically, if we take the average of CBO and OMB data on economic growth, what this first chart shows is that this year we can meet the Gramm-Rudman targets, if we can limit the total level of Federal spending to about 3 percent above the level we spent last year.

I am sure at some point somebody is going to jump up and talk about cuts in spending to meet deficit reduction targets. In case they do, you need to remember that government uses a different language other than official English. Official English says "cut" means spend less than you used to spend, but here in the Senate and the House, "cut" means spend less than you would have spent. So if you would have spent 8 percent more and you are going to spend 3 percent more, only in government is that called a 5-percent cut.

My point is, if you start here in fiscal year 1991 and you go forward, you basically find that in order to meet the Gramm-Rudman targets, we have to limit the growth of Federal spending to between 2 and 5 percent a year, if the economy remains relatively healthy, between the CBO and OMB projections. Now, beginning in 1994, if we make the decision to take Social Security off budget—which I support—in fiscal year 1993, when we can begin to run a surplus, if we do that, we still can have spending growing almost by 5 percent in 1994 and still meet the Gramm-Rudman targets without counting Social Security.

So the debate, Mr. President, is a debate about what are you going to do with the defense savings beyond the level of balanced fiscal restraint necessary in order to meet the Gramm-Rudman targets and balance the budget, first, in a unified budget and, second, without counting Social Security.

Mr. President, there are going to be those who will say what we need to do is simply apply the peace dividend to deficit reduction. Well, if we are going to do that, what we need to do is change the Gramm-Rudman targets and make those targets more demanding; because if we do not do that, let us say, for example, that in 1993, that we were spending $50 to $60 billion less on defense than we would have been spending had things not changed in Eastern Europe, to simply apply that to the deficit would mean allowing nondefense discretionary to grow by over 10 percent.

Mr. President, that is not the kind of balanced fiscal restraint that I think we are looking for. Also, I think we have to be mindful of the fact that that is exactly what produced the decade of the 1970's when, in fact, the $380 billion that were saved over a 7-year period from the end of the Vietnam war was absorbed in government spending, and then the deficit went up and then taxes went up.

So, Mr. President, the real issue here is this: We are going to make a decision over the next 4 years that is going to fundamentally effect the future of America. If we take this peace dividend in the range of $50 to $70 billion by the mid-1990's, and we let government spend it, we are going to be the only nation on Earth that is moving toward more government and not less.

When we hear a proposal on the floor of the House or the Senate of the United States of America that we take defense savings and spend those savings on government, we are putting ourselves in a very select group, because we are the only people on Earth—not in Eastern Europe, not in the Soviet Union itself, is there any organized, respected body of thought that believes that the answer is more government. Only in the United States of America are we hearing an argument that the fruits of the success of freedom, in reducing the necessity that we outlay from the Treasury to keep Ivan back from the gate and to keep the world free, should go not to the people who won the cold war, the long-suffering American taxpayer, but that that money should go to Government.

If we make that decision, if the result of the end of the cold war under the best case scenario resulted in Government getting bigger and more powerful in the United States of America, it would be the ultimate paradox, because when the rest of the world is moving to affirm the sovereignty of the individual, we would be moving to enthrone government with more power and more resources. Mr. President, that would be a great tragedy indeed.

So I wanted to begin the debate today, not to end the debate today. It may be—and I have not read the alternative which has been offered—that that alternative is acceptable, that it is a clever ploy that will get a partisan division. But I want to assure my colleagues that as long as I am in this body, we are going to vote every single day starting next year when the alternative is to increase spending on government and follow the dead-end path that every organized body of thought on Earth has rejected, except the body of thought in the United States of America, that sees government as the answer to every problem and the solution to every ill.

People are going to have an opportunity to vote on whether we want these programs or whether we want to raise the standard deduction, whether we want these programs, or whether we want to eliminate the earnings test under Social Security, whether we want these programs, or whether we want to activate the enterprise zone bills.

What a great paradox it is, Mr. President, that we are trying to use free enterprise to build Eastern Europe; yet, we will not take the fruits of our success and use it through the enterprise zone bill to rebuild the inner cities of our own Nation. That is what this debate is about today.

Today is not the end of the debate, but the beginning. I rejoice in it, that it is coming, and it is going to have a profound impact on the future of America, and I think people understand that. That is why I am happy that, finally, we are beginning the debate.

I yield the floor.

Mr. SASSER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I am delighted to hear our colleagues on the other side of the aisle start to talk about a peace dividend and address the question of creating a peace dividend out of savings that will come from cutting back on defense spending. There seems to be universal agreement now all the way around that defense spending is indeed heading down.

But there is going to be, I think, less agreement on the size of that peace dividend. There has been a lot of confusion surrounding the whole question of a peace dividend and the confusion began early when the Department of Defense and the Secretary of Defense, Mr. Cheney, said that they were considering $180 billion in cuts in the defense budget.

Upon closer examination, we find that that $180 billion cut in defense spending actually comes over 5 years, and when we peel that all the way back we find that this $180 billion cut over 5 years is a cut from a sharply increasing defense budget proposal. And when we examine it closer, we find that at the end of the day, at the end of the 5-year period, under the proposal advanced by Secretary Cheney and the administration, we are actually spending $20 billion more for defense than we did at the beginning of this so-called cut in defense spending.

Now, I hope that as this debate progresses we can get assistance from all of our colleagues, including my distinguished friend from Texas, assistance to carve out a peace dividend.

But I would urge my colleagues that before we start indicating what is to be done with this peace dividend, before we start creating the desire for a tax cut, or creating the desire for anything else, we first address the issue: Is there going to be a peace dividend, and if so, how large will it be?

I well remember back in 1981 when we got into the debate on the tax cut at that particular time. My distinguished friend from Texas was one of the leaders in that debate, and the problem with that tax cut, among others, was that we put the checks in the mail to the taxpayers before we found the money for all those magic asterisks that were swimming around in the so-called Gramm-Latta budget.

I was hoping that this time we would actually find the money before we pass it out.

An interesting document, issued by the Office of Management and Budget, the Office of Management and Budget of Ronald Reagan, indicates that as of January 19, 1989, the tax cut of 1981, the so-called Gramm-Latta tax cut, the Economic Recovery Act of 1981, as it is so euphemistically labeled, deprived the Federal Government and its Treasury of $1.441 trillion as of the end of the fiscal year 1989.

That, Mr. President, represents the cumulative deficit of our Government in that period of time.

So before we go breaking the Treasury again, I want to determine the actual size of this peace dividend and I want to have it in hand.

The national defense budget outlays in 1990 amounted to $296.3 billion. There will be a lot of eloquent speeches made about how we ought to use plain English in describing these outlay numbers. Let us not use this Washington jargon of factoring in inflation into the so-called baseline.

Well, if we use that actual plain English approach, we find that the administration this year is increasing defense spending somewhere in the neighborhood of about $8 billion above the defense spending for fiscal year 1990.

So in plain English, the question becomes where is the peace dividend?

On the issue of tax cuts, we are all for cutting taxes. I am certainly for cutting them. But given the recent past, we have to ask tax cuts for whom? Just recently, the President and his budget director dismissed out of hand a tax cut for working American men and working American women.

When they heard of a tax cut proposed by the Senator from New York, our distinguished colleague, Mr. MOYNIHAN, which would have reduced the oppressive burden of the payroll taxes that marched steadily upward during the decade of the 1980's, the administration immediately turned thumbs down.

This President and this administration seems to think that a tax cut for middle-income Americans would be just plain disastrous for the American economy. But on the other hand, the administration argues that a cut in the capital gains tax would simply do wonders for the economy.

I am left in a quandary. Whose economy are we really concerned about here?

The Joint Tax Committee estimates that two-thirds of the Bush capital gains tax cut will be showered on people who earn more than $200,000 a year. These are the same people who saw their incomes grow by 45 percent during the 1980's.

These individuals, Mr. President, were the beneficiaries of this so-called Economic Recovery Act that was passed in 1981 that robbed the Federal Treasury of $1.4 trillion, the same funds that future generations are either going to have to pay back or compromise their standard of living as a result of the squandering that took place in the decade of the 1980's.

Oh, sure, there is going to be plenty of rhetoric: Were it not for that tax cut, we would not have enjoyed all of this so-called unparalleled prosperity that we enjoyed over the past decade. Who enjoyed that prosperity? The prosperity was enjoyed by a very small minority at the top. If you look underneath and see the real figures, you see that the real income of the average American working person has not increased over the past 13 years one whit.

If we have enjoyed better economic times, and I debate that point, it is not a result of this so-called tax cut for the wealthy. It comes about as the result of the breakup of OPEC, among other things. It comes about as a result of many other factors in the economy.

When we talk about middle-income and poor Americans, it seems that we cannot consider taxing them less. These are the people who have been burdened with higher tax rates while faced with stagnant or falling real incomes in the decade of the 1980's.

I am wondering why tax cuts for the wealthy are just so wonderful and why cutting taxes for working men and working women are not.

I hope that all of my colleagues and perhaps even the Senator from Texas, my distinguished friend, might speak to the President of the United States and get him on board tax reductions for working Americans. Perhaps he might even look favorably on the MOYNIHAN proposal, or have an offshoot of it.

Senator MOYNIHAN, our distinguished colleague from New York, has helped point out that the regressive shift in the Tax Code during the 1980's was not kind to working Americans. Senator MOYNIHAN has highlighted the embezzlement that has gone on and is going on today in the Social Security trust fund, embezzlement that we seek to mask by another device called Gramm-Rudman. As long as the operating portion of this budget remains in deficit, this administration will be stealing from the Social Security trust fund, robbing Peter to pay Paul, as we stand here talking about a tax cut.

No matter what arcane accounting procedures are introduced, until the day comes when operating revenues exceed operating expenditures, this embezzlement will continue. And the Congressional Budget Office tells us that the day is a long way off before operating receipts and revenues exceed operating expenditures.

Any proposal to cut taxes at this point would only push that day farther into the future.

At a time when the American people at the grassroots are waking up to the fact that they are being charged with a regressive payroll tax, that these funds are allegedly being set aside for their old age and a rainy day, at a time when they are waking up to the fact that these funds are being used improperly to finance the operating deficit of this Government, I think this is a poor time to be discussing the whole question of tax cuts.

If there is a peace dividend, a lot of other people believe that the peace dividend might be used to offset this embezzlement of the Social Security fund. The administration's answer to that has been to propose more tax cuts for wealthy and more Rube Goldberg accounting schemes, all to prevent the embezzlement from the trust fund from being brought to an end.

But I do not think these gimmicks wash any more. I think the day of reckoning is very near. No accounting games or gimmicks can hide the fact that as long as this operating budget is in deficit, those Social Security trust funds are going to be used to pay for the rest of the operation of this Government.

So I, too, am looking forward to an interesting debate later this year. I look forward to speaking at length about the ongoing embezzlement of Social Security that we have continued to perpetrate here.

I listened with interest to my distinguished friend speak of the increase in Government spending during the decade of the 1970's. But what he did not tell you, Mr. President, is that two-thirds of this increase is accounted for by spending in Social Security and by spending in medicare. And most of this spending, in fact, almost all of it, is financed by taxes brought in by the regressive payroll tax.

So my view comes down to this: Yes, we need to carve out a peace dividend. It is high time that we quit squandering the Nation's resources on overly sophisticated weapons systems for which I can foresee no need in the immediate future or even in the far future. We need to take this peace dividend and we need to apply these funds wisely.

First and foremost, these funds need to be applied to the operating deficit that is soaking up the Social Security trust funds today as I stand here speaking. Then, if there is going to be a tax cut, it needs to be carefully crafted and carefully targeted to help the working men and women of this country, not a tax cut similar to the one that passed in 1981 that simply lined the pockets of the wealthy in this country and caused the rush of sales of Mercedes Benz automobiles and Cadillacs.

We need a tax that helps working men and women, and not one such as the capital gains tax proposal advanced by the President. We need funds to deal with the problems of drugs. We need funds to deal with the problems of crime here at home. We need funds to deal with the problems of education. We need funds to deal with the problems of our environment.

Mr. President, the amendment that I have offered today, in conjunction with my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts, calls for this peace dividend to be judiciously applied: First, to reduce the budget deficit to stop the hemorrhage, thereby to stop the thievery from the Social Security trust funds; second, to put this Government on a sound financial basis so that we can once more be the master of our own fate, our own economic destiny, and not have to depend on the Japanese, as we did just a few weeks ago, to come in and buy the security instruments of this Government so that we can finance our own deficit. As I stand here today, the Japanese are buying about 25 to 40 percent of the indebtedness sold by this Government by which we finance our budget deficit. A couple of weeks ago, the Japanese sat on the sidelines. They hesitated, and we had to raise interest rates a half point before we could attract them into buying. If sustained, that would cost us about $6 to $8 billion more in 1991 in Federal outlays. The fastest growing components of the Federal budget today is interest paid on the national debt.

So I say it is premature today to be standing here talking about a tax cut or a peace dividend that is illusory. I think the first thing that we must do is join together so that we can have a peace dividend that is substantial. Once we have that peace dividend in hand, then I think we can allocate the means by which it will be used.

I say, first, it ought to be used to reduce this deficit, to get us operating in the black again. Second, it ought to be used to deal with the long-neglected problems that we have in this country. Last, Mr. President, if there is to be a tax cut, it ought to be one that is carefully crafted, that will give some tax relief to these working Americans who have seen their taxes go up steadily during the decade of the 1980's.

Mr. President, just looking at some figures here, we note that during the 1980's, according to the Congressional Budget office, the effective tax rate on the wealthiest 5 percent in this country dropped by 9.5 percent, whereas, on the poorest 10 percent, their effective tax rates went up 28 percent. So much for the tax relief that we got in the decade of the 1980's as a result of the so-called Economic Recovery Act of 1981. We should be very careful to not repeat that grievous error that we committed in 1981 here in the year 1990 if, indeed, a so-called peace dividend should emerge.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, let me say at the outset that it would have been my desire that we not have this debate and discussion on this particular measure, the measure that is dealing with voluntary service for communities across this country, but the Senator from Texas is entitled to raise this issue for discussion and debate. I welcome the leadership that is being provided by the chairman of the Budget Committee, Senator SASSER, and I welcome the opportunity to join with him in an alternative for the Senate to consider.

Mr. President, I was somewhat startled to hear from my good friend, the able legislator, the former distinguished professor of economics, and listen to his analysis in his presentation and review some of the material that he provided for us.

First of all, Mr. President, in looking over the material provided by the Senator from Texas, he talks about a post-Vietnam peace dividend and that the war in Vietnam ended in 1970. Well, I am sure that is news to the many hundreds of thousands of Americans who served in Vietnam in 1971, 1972, 1973, 1974. The last helicopters left in 1957. But the Senator from Texas uses 1970 for the basis of his analysis. Could it be that he was using it not because it was the end of the war—although his presentation would suggest that that is the basis of the argument, the post-Vietnam peace dividend. Well, the war went right through 1975. And when you start his kind of analysis, in 1975 to 1977, you have to reach a rather dramatic different conclusion.

Then, the Senator from Texas tells us that the behavior of the official poverty rate between 1983 and 1988 proves something about the virtues of slashing domestic spending and cutting taxes massively. Let me quote him precisely:

> Tax cuts plus limiting the growth of Federal spending in the 1980's has proven superior in terms of reduction of misery and poverty.

Mr. President, in 1988 the official measured poverty rate was 13.1 percent. The statistic, when translated, means that over 30 million Americans, over 12 million of them children, are living in poverty. Over a decade earlier, in 1977, the officially measured poverty rate was only 11.3 percent.

Just what it is that has been proven superior is not immediately clear to this Senator. Because using the standard of proof of the Senator from Texas, one would be entitled to the obviously absurd conclusion that the stagflation, inflation, slow growth of 1973 through 1976 was proven superior in terms of reduction of misery and poverty.

We do not make that case and we do not suggest that that is the situation. We just cannot follow that kind of logic. It does not justify the lowering of the poverty rate in the late 1970's, when we had other factors that impacted it. And the figures which the Senator from Texas took, when the poverty rate went up during the Reagan period and then went down a little, to try to say all those economic policies really were the thing that brought it down—the statistics, I do not believe, justify. And I think the statistical game has no place here in the Senate.

I will just mention a final one, Mr. President. The Senator from Texas suggested that an analysis of the economic data proves that there is a single right answer to the question of how best to employ a peace dividend. Let me give just one example.

In the materials circulated by the Senator from Texas, he notes that the ratio of total Federal spending to GNP declined by approximately 18 points between 1945 and 1946. He suggests that this single measure explains why the domestic economy boomed in the postwar era.

What the Senator's data does not tell us is that something even more striking happened between 1945 and 1946. Domestic spending doubled. It doubled in the forms of commitment in education, health care, and the development of our road system. It just doubled in 1 year.

So, does this prove that the correct path in 1991 is to double domestic spending? Of course not. And no one is suggesting it.

But using the standard of proof advanced by the Senator from Texas, one would be entitled to such a conclusion. And that is, of course, the key point here. There are no simple, infallible, easily proved and always correct answers. We face an historic opportunity to wind down decades of cold war spending and to use the newly freed-up resources to build economic and social strength. We must take that opportunity seriously and not substitute ideology for careful analysis.

Mr. President, I see my friend and cosponsor, the Senator from Maryland, would like to speak. Then I would like to at least put forward a real alternative for the peace dividend for at least the debate and discussion here on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I modify my pending first-degree amendment, amendment No. 1270, to accept the pending second-degree amendment No. 1271.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment. The amendment is so modified.

The amendment (No. 1270), as modified, is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill, insert the following:

SEC. . POLICY REGARDING "PEACE DIVIDED".

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) In recent months dramatic movements toward greater political and economic freedom have occurred in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union;

(2) these democratic reforms may permit the preservation of our Nation's security at a cost less than current budget projections;

(3) the changes in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union are a direct result of the American taxpayer's willingness and determination to pay the price for the advancement of freedom through the world;

(4) the changes in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union are also a direct result of the total inability of socialist economies to compete with free-market economies;

(5) the family has been the keystone of the ability of Western democracies to promote growth and opportunity; and

(6) the recent democratic reforms in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union have again demonstrated the need to redirect resources from government to the family to meet effectively individual needs of health, education, training, and nutrition.

(b) POLICY.—It is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) any savings resulting from lower defense expenditures below the level required for balanced fiscal restraint to meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit targets and to achieve a balanced budget excluding the Social Security Trust Fund should be returned to America's taxpayers;

(2) only by returning defense savings to American families to invest in their futures and, thus, America's future can the United States assure that the "peace dividend" will be wisely invested; and

(3) savings from the so-called "peace dividend" should be returned to the American taxpayer in the form of measures such as a refundable child care tax deduction, repeal of the Social Security earnings test, an increase in the personal exemption, expansion of a permanent research and development tax credit, a long-term capital gains tax cut, further lowering of marginal tax rates, and other savings and investment incentives.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

THE PRESIDENT'S FISCAL YEAR 1991 BUDGET REQUEST FOR INDIAN PROGRAMS

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I rise today to express my dismay and indignation about the lack of adequate funding to assist our most needy citizens, the Indian and native people of this Nation.

Under the leadership of Senator INOUYE, the Select Committee on Indian Affairs has been engaged in a careful analysis of the historic trends in Federal funding for Indian programs and services. This study reveals a very disturbing fact: funds for Indian programs and services are declining by any accepted measure.

The eligible Indian service population has nearly doubled in the last 20 years. Although it is very likely that the Congress will appropriate in excess of $3 billion for Indian programs in fiscal year 1991, in terms of constant 1982 dollars this appropriation is equivalent to only $1.6 billion. The fact is that Congress is not appropriating and the administration is not requesting sufficient annual funding to keep pace with inflation. When the increase in Indian populations is factored in, which it never is, the funding crisis takes on a new dimension. In general, Indian and native peoples suffer the highest poverty and unemployment rates in the Nation. Yet over the past 15 years Federal funding per capita has increased for all citizens in this Nation except Indians and natives. In fact, the steady decline in funding is such that we are now spending more per capita on everyone else—a condition which has existed and worsened since 1985.

The fiscal year 1991 budget request will continue this trend. The Bureau of Indian Affairs is seeking a net increase over 1990 of less than 1 percent. With projected pay absorptions the BIA budget will actually decline. The IHS claims to be seeking an increase of at least 7 percent, but the net increase is actually closer to 2 percent when pay absorptions and unrealistic assumptions about third-party payments are taken into account. HUD proposes complete elimination of the Indian Housing Program. Funding for the Office of Indian Education and the Administration on Native Americans would basically be stagnant. In sum, inflation will once again result in an actual decrease in funding for Indian programs and services in fiscal year 1991 if we accept the President's budget request.

This is an intolerable situation. We are effectively compelling our poorest citizens to bear a disproportionate share of the Federal fiscal burden. It is simply not acceptable for the administration to propose to eliminate Indian housing funds when there is a documented need for tens of thousands of new homes. It is simply not acceptable to only request $15 million for sanitation facilities when there is a documented backlog of $675 million.

It is simply not acceptable to propose essentially level funding for Indian education programs when student populations and education costs are increasing. These comments serve to highlight only a few points. A careful review of the 1991 budget request for Indian and native programs reveals that virtually every program or service is slated for a real reduction in funding. There is and can be no viable justification for this fact. I hope that the responsible officials in the administration will begin to work with us so we can reverse the downward trend in funding for Indian and native programs and services. I, for one, believe we are legally and morally bound to do no less.

Mr. President, this chart that I have here is a comparison of real annual percent changes in Federal budgets and the Indian budget. You might notice the Department of Education has received an increase in health functions, HUD, et cetera, while Indian education has a serious decrease in BIA education, Indian housing, economic development for Indians, BIA economic developments, Association for Native Americans, American Natives Administration, total Indian programs in BIA as opposed to total Federal budget.

Mr. President, there is another chart I would like to point out here, and that has to do with the overall funding since fiscal year 1975. Projected BIA and overall Indian spending in real dollars, as we can see, is declining.

Mr. President, the reason these graphs are so incredibly onerous, in my view, is that there is no way you can put on the chart the dramatic and dynamic explosion in population of native Americans which exacerbates these numbers rather dramatically. Most statistics indicate that over half the population on Indian reservations today are below the age of 18. These people need these programs; they need help; they need assistance.

Finally, Mr. President, as the vice chairman of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs last year, we held a series of hearings which I believe will prove to be important in addressing some of these issues. The first hearing, the first witness was Mr. Leonard Garment who likened Congress and the American people's attention to Indian issues with that of the 17-year locust. Once every 17 years, the locust comes out and makes a lot of noise, we pay a lot of attention to it and then it goes back into the woodwork, the trees, the ground or wherever 17-year locusts disappear to.

The fact is today, Mr. President, America's neediest citizens, America's poorest citizens are receiving the least amount of the Federal dollar. I will be proposing amendments and increases in appropriations throughout the coming year in order to rectify some of these gross inequities, and I look forward to receiving the support of my colleagues in what I think is an effort which is a moral imperative.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

NATIONAL AND COMMUNITY SERVICE ACT OF 1989

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the Gramm underlying amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk. I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

AMENDMENT NO. 1272 TO AMENDMENT NO. 1270, AS MODIFIED

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will report the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] proposes an amendment numbered 1272 to the Gramm amendment No. 1270 as modified.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. KENNEDY. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The assistant legislative clerk continued as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted insert the following:

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that funds saved as a result of reductions in military expenditures shall be used for—

(1) balancing the budget, without resorting to use of the Social Security surpluses, in order to stop the ongoing "thievery" and "embezzlement" from the Social Security Trust Funds;

(2) urgent national priorities, including investing in America's future, anti-drug and anti-crime efforts, education, head start, health care, the environment, rebuilding the infrastructure, assisting emerging democracies, and other critical needs;

(3) tax reductions for working men and women.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT WITH INSTRUCTIONS AMENDMENT NO. 1273

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I move to recommit the pending bill with instructions to report back in status quo, with the following amendment which I send to the desk. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Texas moves to recommit the bill with instructions to report back in status quo with the following amendment, Amendment Numbered 1273:

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I rise in support of the pending Gramm amendment on the "peace dividend."

Before proceeding, I would like to remind my colleagues that it is well not to be too premature in judging to the size and availability of this so-called peace dividend. We have along way to go to secure the kind of peace we need to obtain a significant dividend. We must sign and implement conventional reductions agreements and START agreements, and see the U.S.S.R. make good on its promises of major unilateral arms reductions. However, I do not think there is any serious reason to doubt that there will be a significant peace dividend.

This dividend may well help us cut taxes, but it is important to note that it will not make a significant reduction in the budget deficit. Defense spending has already dropped to around 5 percent of the GNP and the current budget plans of the Bush administration call for it to drop to 4 percent in fiscal year 1995—the lowest level in 50 years.

Defense spending has not driven the increase in Federal spending, taxes, or the budget deficit that has placed such a burden on the American people. The increases have taken place in civil spending and entitlements—which have risen from less than 50 percent of the Federal budget in the 1950's to more than 60 percent in the late 1960's, to 75 percent in the late 1980's. As a result, Federal spending on domestic and entitlement programs has risen from 7.3 percent of GNP at the end of the Korean war, and 11.5 percent at the end of the Vietnam war, to 17 percent in fiscal year 1990.

Important as the peace dividend may eventually be, our primary goal must be to cut the budget deficit and Federal spending. Nondefense Federal, State, and local programs are consuming an ever increasing percent of our GNP. State and local taxes have compensated for most reductions in Federal taxes, and the total tax burden Government places on the American people is over 30 percent of our GNP, and virtually one-third of all the economic activity in the United States.

We also know that the American people want a strong economy. They know the best way to maintain a strong economy is to have money in their pockets and in their bank accounts—money which they can both save and invest in the future of this country.

We also need to reduce taxes to help deal with the impact of cutting defense spending on the economy.

In a State like mine, Mr. President, we will experience significant defense cuts. We will need sufficient capital to stimulate small and large businesses, and compensate for the unemployment which we are bound to experience when major defense industries experience significant reductions.

More generally, I worry about the perception throughout the world that this Congress keeps trying to hide the deficit rather than reduce it. Using the savings from the peace dividend to pay for more civil spending would just be another example of such "smoke and mirrors." In contrast, restraint on the part of the Congress that reduced total Federal spending would serve us well.

Accordingly, I cannot support Senator GRAMM too strongly in saying when the peace dividend comes, and we can safely begin to spend it, it is the American people who have earned it. It is the American people, through their steadfast adherence to the principles of freedom and democracy, their respect for human rights and, very importantly, their willingness to spend hundreds and hundreds of billions of their tax dollars for defense and freedom throughout the world, that sacrifice should be repaid to them in the form of a tax cut so that they can have those moneys to invest, to save, and to use for their education, for their welfare, and that of their children.

So I want to congratulate my friend from Texas on a very well-thought-out amendment, and one that I think most of the American people will support. I congratulate him on his recognition that larger governments and larger government programs do not necessarily mean that we will have a healthy economy and healthy Americans, but giving the American people more money for investment, for savings, and to make our economy continue to grow is the best thing we can do for all Americans.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Thank you, Mr. President. I rise in support of the Kennedy alternative to this discussion on the peace dividend.

I find it very intriguing that the party of the administration has brought up even the concept of the peace dividend because I have seen nothing in the Defense Department budget that indicates that we are heading toward a peace dividend.

I hope we will. We spend $157 billion on the defense of Western Europe. If in fact the cold war is over, maybe we could get one ice cube back for the American people and put it to work here in our own country. What would be my idea of one ice cube? Ten percent, which would be approximately $15 billion. What will we do with it? I would say yes, we apply it to deficit reduction. But at the same time, to then apply a substantial part of that in investing in a America's future.

That $157 billion that we spent on the defense of Western Europe has been well spent. It has been spent on the preservation of our national security. But, Mr. President, what then is the new call for our national security? How do we maintain our security, particularly in the 21st century? I believe that our political freedom rests on our economic freedom and our economic vitality. In order to do that we have to think of a global economy. We have to think of science. We have to think of technology.

Mr. President, I then want to take the next step to talk about my Subcommittee on Appropriations. I feel very privileged and honored to chair the Subcommittee on Appropriations that I think deals with America's future.

Mr. President, it deals with veterans, housing, the National Space Agency, EPA, and the National Science Foundation, as well as 23 other agencies.

The distinguished Senator from Texas, who offered the original amendment or the first-degree amendment, is on that subcommittee, and he knows how squeezed for revenue we were. Where were we squeezed for revenue? A program like NASA: In order to keep America flying in space we have to have White House meetings—and I must say the White House is very cooperative—on how we can keep the shuttle flying, and how we talk about the space station. Now our Vice President wants to take us to the Moon and to Mars at the cost initially this year alone of $175 million.

Mr. President, there is an old song that says "Fly Me to the Moon." But right now I only have those high notes to take me there. I have no sustainable revenue source for the NASA program.

Let us take a look at the National Science Foundation. When I finished with my 302(b), working with Senator GARN, my very able ranking minority, all we could put into the National Science Foundation was $2 billion. Mr. President, in times of the real American need for scientific research and scientific education, that is a rinky-dink amount of money. In the area of science education alone, Mr. President, all we could put into science education was $191 million. Our whole community college system only had access to $4 million for reinstrumentation of their laboratories, and this is the institutional framework, the educational framework that is supposed to educate the kids for the 21st century in technical fields. Mr. President, that was $4 million.

Then we talked about the laboratory rehabilitation we talked about the laboratory and those schools that are most likely to be the incubators for bachelors, masters, and Ph.D.'s; primarily our small- to medium-sized colleges. The authorizing committee authorized $100 million for that revitalization of our college laboratories. The most I could squeeze to get into it was $20 million.

Mr. President, in historic black colleges, this afternoon in some of those schools, the laboratories are of such an age that they constitute health hazards. When we talk about why did our guys fight for this country, why did we continue to fund NATO, so that we could have the freedom to pursue our future. In order to do that, we have to put our money into something. So if there is a peace dividend, let us make sure we reinvest so we keep the peace in terms of our economic prosperity.

Mr. President, there is no tax deduction to do the kinds of things that I am talking about. There is no tax deducations to fund NASA. There is no tax deduction to fund elementary and secondary education in science-education. So I think I make my point.

I really am sympathetic to the middle class who feel besieged, beleaguered and beset. A lot of it is because of local property tax, and local property taxes have increased because we have shifted the burden. We have shifted; we have not alleviated the burden. We have shifted the burden.

Now that middle class feels that general revenue sharing alone—in my own community—has resulted in a diminishment in service and increase in property tax. I am sure it is true in Dallas and Houston as it is in Phoenix, and in any other part of this country, Mr. President.

If we really want to reduce taxes, the Federal Government ought to assume that responsibility which is theirs, and do not leave it to local city councils to foot the bill. And those ordinary people who own homes, Mr. President, if there is a peace dividend, let us make sure we invest in our 21st century some of the results.

Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I agree with what my friend from Maryland said because it is not clear to me either that there is a peace dividend in the offering.

I have not seen the negotiations that have allowed us to really make the kind of cuts in defense that would constitute a peace dividend. On the other hand, some people might say there has already been a peace dividend, because defense has not grown.

While the budget has grown at a rate in excess of inflation in the last few years, defense has grown at a rate a good deal less than inflation. So in a way there has already been a defense dividend.

One has to ask: Have we made some savings? Has the budget deficit really gone down? With the exception of 1987, when overall Government spending went up by just 1.3 percent, we were able to hold Government increases in spending down. As a matter of fact, the budget deficit came from $221 to $150, down by a third. Regretfully, we have not been able to do that 2 years in a row.

That is what the Senator from Texas stands for, what the Senator from Colorado stands for, and what I stand for. We would like to keep spending down for more than a couple of years in row. In a sense, there has been a defense dividend already that all of us can spend. As we look ahead and say that it is likely we are going to have some truthful negotiations, it is not unlikely that our commitments in defense may indeed go down. It is simply too soon to say.

This morning at the Budget Committee one of my colleagues said we are already to receive our mustering-out pay. The cold war is over. That is not clear to me at all. I have seen no evidence that the Russians have reduced their numbers of missiles, reduced their number of people in the armed services, and their number of tanks or anything else.

I certainly have seen some evidence that society struggles with this defense burden. It is not unlikely that there will be some reductions, as it is not unlikely that there will be some future negotiations that will lead to a meaningful peace dividend.

But this bill, Mr. President, is already an effort to spend it. That is why the Senator from Texas and now the Senator from Minnesota wishes to speak out about this bill. This is an effort to spend. And, as a matter of fact, if you look at the report of this bill, on page 72, the estimated outlays as, I understand, have been changed.

The estimated outlays are about $700 million in a 5-year period, and the estimated budget authority is $2.406 billion over a 5-year period. I understand that some changes have been made, but I also understand there is a smaller initial outlay and authorization, and we will see that grow in future years.

This amendment expresses our efforts to whack away at the budget deficit in the event there is a peace dividend. This amendment assures our children and grandchildren that debts still larger than the ones that we have before us today will not be imposed on them.

We hope that there will be a peace dividend. It would be good for our children, our grandchildren and the world. Whether or not it is to come is still, I believe, a matter of negotiation in most areas.

As the Senator from Texas has pointed out, many peace dividends are indeed inured to the benefit of the taxpayers, because taxpayers and citizens of this country have been able to increase and improve their living standards. But he also pointed out that the peace dividend we most recently experienced following the Vietnam conflict was a peace dividend that was consumed entirely by growing Federal programs. Many of these programs were initiated at a time when the Vietnam war was escalating. None of that inured to the benefit of the taxpayer, and indeed it established the deficit at about the level that it was now.

Many people criticize President Reagan for the level of the deficit. Few here in this body point out that the President submits a budget, and thereafter, it is the Congress that passes the budget. The budget, unlike other pieces of legislation here, does not have to be signed. It is not a piece of legislation in the sense that it is subject to a Presidential veto.

After the President submits the budget, the Congress determines what is going to be spent and what the balances are going to be at the end of the year. yes, the President can veto some legislation, if required, but by and large the budget is in our hands. Perhaps we, and not the President, should share the major part of the blame for the deficit.

Even if the President is to blame, it is interesting to note that the level of the deficit presently is somewhat lower than the deficit when Ronald Reagan became President in 1981, if you compare it as a percentage of gross national profits. Frankly we want a peace dividend and we hope a peace divident will come. It would be a marvelous thing for all of America.

We understand that not all of it will be used to reduce the deficit. I think that probably is a practical and realistic assessment of what is going to happen. But nevertheless, some or perhaps even most of it, should be applied to the deficit so that people will not have to see their taxes increased, so that the people of the United States will be able to experience better and higher living standards, so that the people of the United States will have a choice to make about how the money is spent and not we here in the Senate or in the House or the Government.

That really is the essence of a free people, that they have control of their lives and of their futures, and that the Government does not have the ability, or has not sought to have the ability to do all things for them.

So I am in total agreement with my friend from Texas. I think this is a good amendment on the right bill. I think that this bill is one of a number of bills that we are going to see here, that in effect are efforts to spend the peace dividend even before it arrives. As the Senator from Maryland has stated, the peace dividend has not yet arrived.

She listed a number of other areas, and I do not disagree with her in those areas. There are many things I would like to spend more money on in the Government, particularly the areas she spoke about: education, research and development.

Yes, we have this compulsion, this mandate that we have to get the budget deficit under control. It is one of the serious undone jobs that we face before us. Therefore, I compliment the Senator from Texas for bringing forward this amendment at this time and for putting it on this bill. This bill is one of a series of steps that all of us are going to experience in an effort to spend the peace dividend even before it arrives.

I yield the floor.

Mr. ARMSTRONG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, a lot of times in this body, we vote on things that have sort of hidden meanings. We vote on issues that are in fact proxies for larger issues. We vote on pieces of legislation that give us a chance to sort of hint at our underlying principles and philosophies which guide us. Once in a while we really get to vote on something that clearly says here is how we feel about the country and how we feel about where we ought to go.

The Gramm amendment is such an occasion. It is fairly rare that you get such a direct, broad-gauged issue presented with such clarity and simplicity, This is a very simple matter. If there is a peace dividend—and I have skepticism about that, and I will comment on that briefly. But if we have a peace dividend, if additional funds are released for military spending, we have some option over what happens to those funds.

Some in the Chamber believe that we ought to spend that money by creating or increasing funding for existing programs in domestic spending, many of which are worthy programs. Others think we ought to give it back to the taxpayers or use it to reduce the national debt.

Senator GRAMM says that to the extent there is money available, it ought to go back to the taxpayers. After all, they financed the cold war in the first place and made it possible to win the victories that seem to be on the horizon.

I do not know if he used this expression today, but I have heard him tell about the distinction between those who are pulling the wagon and those who are riding in the wagon and the ones shooting the wheels off the wagon. If he did not use that analogy today, he should have, because this is a clear-cut case.

If we have extra money, do we want to give it back to the people who have made all this possible in the first place? It is their money to start with. Should they be permitted to keep a greater fraction of it? I am sure none of my colleagues will be surprised to learn that I come down on the side of giving it back to the taxpayers or using the money, to the extent there is a peace dividend, to reduce the national debt.

Will there be a peace dividend? I am agnostic about that. I am sure that there really will be. In fact, with all the discussion about how we are going to save money in defense spending, I have been trying to think, where are we going to make these gigantic savings?

I cannot help recalling that even those who seldom or never vote for a defense measure around here, when it comes to closing down a base in their home constituency, by gosh, they think that is a terrible idea. Even those who, all through the years, when some of us were fighting to build up the armed strength of this country because we thought that was the way to keep peace and win victories without violence, we could not get support from a certain contingent in this body. And yet whenever there was a proposal to close down a camp, post, installation, or even a recruiting office, some of these same people stood up and said: You cannot close that; that is in my District.

That is their right, but knowing human nature, I guess when it comes right down to making some of these savings, it will not be as easy to do as a lot of people think.

It may be that those Senators and Members of the House that represent the great sea ports of this country where there are ships home ported will say, yes, it is time to decommission a bunch of ships and discharge a bunch of sailors and close down naval yards. I will be surprised if that happens. Perhaps I shall be pleasantly surprised.

But I recall, for example, when there was a proposal to close an installation or two in my own home State of Colorado, that every Member of the Colorado congressional delegation, except one, stood up to say that that was just unthinkable, that we could not possibly close anything that would affect our constituents.

I guess that is the same thing that has happened in a lot of States and a lot of areas.

There is a natural desire to continue spending even for things that might seem to be outmoded by world developments. I do not know if there will be a peace dividend. Frankly, I hope there is. To some extent I believe there should be. It appears to me we should not miss the opportunity to put our fiscal house in order if there is a peace dividend. To the extent that we have funds available where we have an option of either spending them to create or fund new programs or give it back to the taxpayers, it seems to me it is time to give the taxpayers a break.

So I congratulate my friend from Texas. I am not sure if I am a cosponsor of this amendment. If I am not, I ask unanimous consent that I be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Washington.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I wish to add my voice to those which have offered support to the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Texas. I understand we have now resolved the procedural difficulties and will have an opportunity to vote for or against both his amendment and that which the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts offered for Senator SASSER.

I believe, however, that I should begin my remarks by pointing out that the principal peace dividend which the United States has received as a result of its strength and determination is peace itself. To the extent that Members are willing to congratulate this country and themselves for the proposition that the cold war is either completely over, as some claim, or that at the very least we live in a much safer world this year than was the case 1 year ago, that happy set of circumstances is, I believe, due to the fact that the people of the United States have been willing to sacrifice, have been willing to burden themselves with the cost of a national defense system which has made them secure, has secured the balance of the free world and which has provided the kind of beacon which has caused many other nations to select the kind of freedom and opportunity which we represent as against that of our erstwhile rivals.

In fact, one of the most salutary results of this period of time has been the domestic changes in the Soviet Union itself, and while it perhaps has greater difficulties than do any of its former satellities in Eastern Europe, nevertheless, the Soviet people are no different from those of any other country in their desire for freedom and for economic opportunity.

So, we really have already gained an immense peace dividend, the kind of peace dividend for which Presidents as long ago as Harry Truman and Dwight Eisenhower worked, a peace dividend which has been the goal of those who have believed in the message of the United States and in its strength over a period of close to five decades now.

As a consequence of this true peace dividend, there also will be a fiscal dividend as well. Whether we can define it as precisely as did the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Ms. MIKULSKI]—I believe she used the figure $157 billion—of course, I am not quite certain, but there will be immense savings in expenditures in national defense from those we expected we would have to undertake as recently as a year or 2 ago. Yes, there will be.

The debate, which is essentially being initiated here on the floor of the U.S. Senate this afternoon, is over how we deal with that fiscal defense dividend, where does that money go, where would it be most constructively utilized.

If the Senator from Texas has offered us any insight in that program, and I believe he has offered serveral such insights, the most important is his recalling of the history of the last similar peace dividend and a reminder that we should take certain lessons from the way in which that peace dividend was utilized. Wherever or whenever that peace dividend began, and it certainly did begin before the formal termination of the Vietnam war, it did amount to at least several hundred billion dollars.

Yet, as the distinguished Senator from Texas has pointed out, the net result after that huge multihundreds of billions of dollars of peace dividend had been granted to the United States was that we were spending more money than we had been spending before, that the tax burden on the American people was greater than it had been before, that the rate of inflation was higher than it had been before, and that the national deficit was greater than it was at the beginning of the term of that peace dividend, largely because so many undifferentiated, different, and sometimes inconsistent, spending programs had been launched, each with a good will and each with its own individual justification by the Congress of the United States.

As a consequence, the Senator from Texas has suggested that we learn from that lesson and that the next time around we first get our own fiscal house in order, and in this respect his proposal and that of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, at least chronologically, are identical. Each of them speaks of this peace dividend really beginning only when we have brought our national fiscal house in order and have balanced the budget, specifically, in the case of the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts, after we have balanced the budget without counting into that calculation receipts which go into the Social Security trust fund. Thereafter, the two proposals differ. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes, as a second priority, that the money be used on a wide range of social or infrastructure programs, each of which, taken individually, is obviously desirable for the country, but which do not differ in their philosophy, in the view of this Senator, from the way in which we handled the priorities at the time of that earlier post-Vietnam peace dividend, with a very slight change in phraseology.

What the Senator from Massachusetts commends to us is precisely what led us into all of our various difficulties toward the end of the 1970's.

Then after that, the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts again becomes more or less identical, certainly highly similar to that of the Senator from Texas. Then the balance of the money should be returned to the American people as individuals and as families to set priorities as they wished.

This similarity, however, hides a fairly profound difference between the two approaches. The Senator from Texas has great faith in the wisdom and the ability of the American people to set their own priorities with their own money. The Senator from Massachusetts, by setting that priority third and having so many others ahead of it, almost effectively precludes any real tax relief to the American people themselves and essentially says that the Congress can determine a better set of priorities for the spending of this money than can the people themselves.

On consideration, Mr. President, I suspect that I will vote for both of these amendments. I greatly prefer that proposed by the Senator from Texas because, it seems to me, that it takes counsel of the lessons which we have learned from history and sets the orders of priorities correctly. But I will say for the Senator from Massachusetts that, by setting at the very beginning of this process an appropriate, proper, and, I would say, a conservative fiscal policy, it is certainly a better order of priorities than to do nothing at all and to move helter-skelter into the future without even having considered how we will order these priorities.

So, I am delighted to be a cosponsor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas, which seems to me to set proper fiscal priorities. I am almost equally pleased that it has elicited from the Senator from Massachusetts the kind of response it has, because that response, while I do not believe it to be as positive as the proposal from the Senator from Texas, is certainly an improvement over doing nothing.

This is a debate which obviously will engage Members of this body and the other body and the people of the United States through the entire decade of the 1990's. I believe we have made a good start today, and we could do far worse than to adopt both of these amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, what I would like to do is propound the request to deal with the proposal of Senator GRAMM and Senator SASSER. I understand it is agreeable to the Senator from Texas.

I ask unanimous consent that the motion to recommit be withdrawn and that there be 60 minutes equally divided between Senators KENNEDY and GRAMM, that immediately upon the conclusion or yielding back of time the Senate vote immediately, without any intervening action, on a Sasser amendment identical to amendment No. 1271, to be modified as a first-degree amendment, and that immediately upon the completion of that vote, the Senate vote, without any intervening action, on the Gramm amendment No. 1270, as further modified by amendment No. 1273, that amendment No. 1272 be withdrawn, that no amendments or motions be in order to the amendment, except a motion to table the motion to reconsider the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HELMS. Reserving the right to object and I hope I will not have to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

Mr. HELMS. If it would be agreed that I would have no more than 7 or 8 minutes, but I want to be assured of that much.

Mr. GRAMM. I would be happy to yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. LOTT. Reserving the right to object, we are going to be protected and have an opportunity to participate in this debate even under this agreement, are we not?

Mr. GRAMM. It would be my intention, knowing the great eloquence of the Senator from Mississippi, to yield him a substantial amount of the time that I have. And I intend to yield a part of that time to the distinguished Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 1274

(Purpose: To state the sense of the Senate on the uses of the peace dividend)

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SASSER], for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, and Mr. KOHL, proposes an amendment numbered 1274.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. SYMMS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard. The clerk will continue reading the amendment.

The legislative clerk continued reading as follows:

At the end of the bill, insert the following:

SEC . POLICY REGARDING "PEACE DIVIDEND".

(a) FINDINGS.—The Senate finds that—

(1) in recent months, dramatic movements toward greater political and economic freedom have occurred in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union; and

(2) these democratic reforms will permit the preservation of our Nation's security at a cost less than current budget levels.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that funds saved as a result of reductions in military expenditures shall be used for—

(1) balancing the budget, without resorting to use of the Social Security surpluses, in order to stop the ongoing "thievery" and "embezzlement" from the Social Security Trust Funds;

(2) urgent national priorities, including investing in America's future, anti-drug and anti-crime efforts, education, health care, the environment, rebuilding the infrastructure, assisting emerging democracies, and other critical needs;

(3) tax reductions for working men and women.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield such time as the Senator from Tennessee desires.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

I think this debate today is significant because for the first time I think there is a general consensus that there is going to be a peace dividend. I said in times past that if there is going to be a peace dividend this year in this budget it is going to be up to the Congress to carve out a peace dividend.

Last year, the administration, in their defense function of the Federal budget, spent somewhere in the neighborhood of $296 to $298 billion in outlays. This year, the administration is requesting $306 billion in funds for the 1991 defense budget.

Clearly, Mr. President, there is no peace dividend in this budget that was submitted this year by the Bush administration. But judging from the tenor of this debate so far, it would appear that there is a general consensus here among our colleagues that there is going to be a peace dividend. And the question simply is, how should this peace dividend be utilized?

Well, I could not agree more that a peace dividend ought to be utilized initially, and substantial portions of it, to reduce the Federal deficit.

How large a peace dividend should we strive for? The years immediately following the Korean war, leading up to the war in Vietnam and in the years immediately following the war in Vietnam before we engaged in the massive military buildup beginning in 1982, we averaged spending somewhere in the range of $215 billion in 1990 dollars for defense. Now, in 1990 dollars, that is roughly about $80 to $85 billion more than the administration is requesting in their defense budget this year.

Bear in mind that following the war in Korea and following the war in Vietnam, we were facing a Soviet Union that we deemed to be inherently hostile to the United States, one that was threatening and that we perceived to be armed to the teeth. I submit now that we are making some judgments which indicate that perhaps our original estimates of the military prowess of the Soviet Union during those periods was overestimated. But, nevertheless, we felt that $215 to $220 billion a year in 1990 dollars was sufficient to meet the Soviet threat during the decade of the 1950's, during a portion of the decade of the 1960's, before we became actively engaged in Vietnam, and we felt that amount was sufficient following our disengagement from Vietnam. This was during the period of the Eisenhower administration, the early years of President Kennedy's administration, the years of President Nixon's administration, following Vietnam, and President Ford's administration following Vietnam, and also during the era of President Carter.

So clearly there is a peace dividend to be had here if the Congress will simply carve it out, a peace dividend that can amount to as much as $80- or $90 billion in a period of 2 or 3 years without impairing the ability of this Government to protect the national security of the United States one whit.

Now let us say that that peace dividend is delivered. Where should it go? Well, I submit, No. 1, it ought to go to help balance this budget deficit. We have been running, during this decade of the 1980's, the largest budget deficits in the history of this country. We have seen the national indebtedness of the United States triple during the space of the 1980's.

It took this country 200 years to buildup a national debt of slightly under $1 trillion, but from 1981 forward we have seen that national debt more than triple.

Then we look to see what is the proximate cause of this hemorrhage from the Treasury of the United States. Well, I called my colleagues' attention just a moment ago to the Economic Recovery Act of 1981. According to the Office of Management and Budget of President Reagan, Reagan's OMB, the Economic Recovery Act of 1981, the so-called supply side tax cut, deprived this Treasury of $1.400 trillion over the decade of the 1980's. You take that number and add to it the military buildup during the decade of the 1980's and there is your increase in the national debt.

Now, the question comes: Where did this tax cut go to? Who benefited from the tax cuts in 1981?

Well, Mr. President, clearly the working men and women of this country did not benefit from that tax cut. During the decade of the 1980's, the richest 5 percent, as I said earlier, saw there incomes go up 45 percent. The poorest 10 percent saw their incomes go down by 8.4 percent, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

During the decade of the 1980's, we saw the formulation of the most regressive tax structure in the 20th-century history of this country. During the 1980's the effective tax rate of the wealthiest 5 percent dropped by almost 10 percent and the poorest 10 percent saw there effective tax rate rise by 28 percent. So when we start talking about tax cuts, I say to my colleagues, we better give some consideration to who those tax cuts should be for.

There has been some statement on the floor of this body that as a result of these tax cuts we unleashed this mightly economic engine of the American economy. Mr. President, I call the attention of my colleagues to these statistics. During the decade 1970–79, the real gross national product of this country grew by 32.1 percent. Bear in mind, Mr. President, this occurred during a period when we were suffering from two very severe oil shocks. This came at a time when we were talking about stagflation. This came at a time when we were concerned about slow growth in our GNP.

During the decade of the 1980's from 1980 to 1989, we saw this real growth in GNP slow by 2.1 percent; 32.1 percent real growth in GNP from 1970 to 1979 vs 30.0 percent real GNP growth from 1980 to 1989.

I know my colleagues, many of them on the other side of the aisle, are very fond of talking about economic growth from 1932 forward. They are very fond of using as a basline the worse recession, indeed depression, that this country has had since the 1930's and then building up from there. Mr. President, I submit that is mistaken. In my view we ought to look at it from decade to decade.

Then the statement was made earlier, well the deficit is down now as a percent of GNP from what it was in 1980. The facts are that the deficit as a percent of GNP in 1980 stood at 2.8 percent. Bear in mind we were not borrowing or taking or embezzling money, as one of our colleagues characterized it, from the Social Security fund in 1980 to offset the deficit. Today, in 1990, when we take out the embezzlement that is occurring with the Social Security trust fund we find that the deficit as a percent of GNP is percent, almost double what it was in 1980.

So, Mr. President, when we state talking about tax cuts the first question is who should these cuts got to? Then, when we start talking about unlocking the economic engine of this country with these tax cuts, I think we need to restudy some of the recent history.

Mr. President, I am going to strive mightily to see that we realize a peace dividend this year and in the following years, if international conditions remain as they are at the present time. But I submit the funds from this peace dividend ought to go first to addressing the imbalance in this deficit that we have now; to redressing the imbalance in the tax structure that we see in this country at the present time when some would wish to perpetuate even further.

Just let me give an example. Under the capital gains tax proposal that was passed last year in one House and espoused by the administration, we find that those making less than $50,000 would get 8 percent of the benefits of that capital gains tax cut. But if we take the Moynihan tax proposal, a real tax cut for real working people, we find that fully 55.7 percent of the benefit would flow to people making less than $50,000.

So when we start talking about cutting taxes, Mr. President, I think we need to give some consideration as to whose taxes we are talking about and whose taxes are going to be cut.

But this peace dividend should be directed, I think, first to putting the fiscal house of this Government in order, redressing what I think will be characterized by historians in the future as the fiscal madness of the U.S. Government during the decade of the 1980's. And then it ought to be applied to some of the long-neglected domestic needs of this country, things like education, rebuilding the infrastructure—the list goes on and on. And then we ought to discuss the question of giving a real meaningful tax cut, Mr. President, to the working men and women of this country who have paid the cost of bringing us through the period of the last 50 or 60 years, to the point that we can get to this payoff and actually look forward to a peace dividend.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? The Senator from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I want to focus on the real issues here. Let me first of all make it clear that the amendment which I have proposed does not prejudge a peace dividend. I personally believe there will be one. I also believe it will be declared prematurely, before the money is in the bank. And that it will probably represent imprudent public policy. But that really is not the issue here.

In my amendment I simply say the reforms in Eastern Europe "may permit the preservation of our Nation's security at a cost less than current budget projections." And then, any savings below the level necessary in defense savings to parallel nondefense savings to allow us to meet the Gramm-Rudman targets, balance the budget, and then balance the budget without counting the Social Security trust fund, that defense savings beyond that level if they occur should go back to families to invest in their future and therefore to invest in the future of America. That is what my resolution is about.

Let me turn, Mr. President, to the difference between the two resolutions. First of all, I intend to vote for the first resolution. It is a kind of kiss-your-sister resolution. But I never had a sister so this gives me an opportunity to do something I always wanted to do. I am also going to vote for it in part because of my distinguished colleague, Senator KENNEDY. I salute him for having been an early supporter of Gramm-Rudman. But now when I get to see our distinguished colleague from Tennessee who wants to repeal Gramm-Rudman talking about balancing the budget and reducing taxes, I cannot let that go unrewarded. So I intend to vote for this resolution.

But let me make it clear, Mr. President, that this is a do-anything kind of resolution but it does mention two things that I think it is good that we mention.

The difference really boils down to the second section of their resolution and I want to read that section. It says:

> The savings from defense should go to urgent national priorities, including investing in America's future.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues, who can we trust to invest in America's future, the Federal Government or the families of America?

I submit, Mr. President, that my amendment, which calls for us to give this money back to American families to let them invest in their own future, represents the transferring of resources to the one repository in American society that has proved itself up to the challenge. It also represents a fundamental continuation of the policy which won the cold war and tore down the Berlin Wall. If investment in America's future comes from Government, then how are we fundamentally different from the economic systems that are collapsing?

Second, we have a lot of talk in here about infrastructure. I heard several of my colleagues talk about new spending programs and talk about new infrastructure. Let me remind my colleagues that the record of the Congress on spending on infrastructure is dismal. In 1965, on infrastructure programs, the space program, air traffic controllers, we spent 2.6 percent of the budget on those items. Today we are spending 1.3 percent of the budget. Where is the investment in infrastructure?

Might I remind my colleagues that in these areas, consistently we have cut, first, President Reagan's budget proposals, and now President Bush's proposals. I heard our dear colleague from Maryland—and I congratulate her for being an excellent committee chairperson—who has within her allocation of funds tried to fund important programs. But, Mr. President, I am not talking about starving the Government in my amendment. I am saying the Government should grow as the economy grows, not faster than the economy grows. The Government should grow and can grow in meeting the Gramm-Rudman targets without a tax increase between 3 and 5 percent a year. That is between $30 billion and $50 billion a year. Is there not money in a $50 billion growth in the ability to fund the space program or the National Science Foundation?

Mr. President, to criticize a proposal to balance the budget for not giving us enough money for those important investments is like a drunk who goes out and spends all his money on whisky and then cusses his employer for not giving him enough money. The problem is in the priorities; the problem is not in the budget.

Finally, let me say that I think our dear colleague from Minnesota touched on something when he talked about the appropriateness of this amendment on this bill. Mr. President, this is yet a new spending program and, quite frankly, it is an Eastern European spending program. Only in Eastern Europe do you have to pay people to volunteer. Only in a collectivist society do you have to pay people to do something they claim to be doing voluntarily or make them do it.

This bill is a throwback to the failed policies of the past, but, in one important way, it is relevant to this debate. It is relevant to this debate because it is one of these rear-end loaded spending programs. The reason I have offered my amendment is that we are going to be voting on hundreds of these amendments. They are going to be adopted. They are going to cost a little money at first, but by 1993, 1994, 1995, we are going to find, just as we did in the post-Vietnam era, that we have squandered the defense savings on big Government.

Mr. President, I have several people who are ready to speak. No one on the other side wants to speak.

Let me first yield to the distinguished Senator from Idaho and, if I may, let me begin by yielding 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. SYMMS. I thank the distinguished Senator from Texas for yielding.

Mr. President, I rise in opposition of this bill—the National and Community Service Act of 1989.

The title of the legislation sounds very impressive. It seems to connote good old American values and the importance of volunteer service to the community and the Nation as a whole. If the bill did, in fact, stand for this, I would support it wholeheartedly. However, I believe the National and Community Service Act misses the mark of the original intention.

Volunteer service means to give one's time and effort to a cause or service that will benefit others without self-interest. That is not what this bill promotes. Instead, it offers financial rewards for those who voluntarily participate in various programs; it pays people to volunteer. And, we all know that when the Government claims to finance something, it means the taxpayers will pay for it. So, the reality of this legislation is that the taxpayers will pay others to volunteer their services. If the original goal of the National and Community Service Act was true volunteer participation, the bill has badly missed its mark.

I would like to point out a few of the problems I see with this legislation. First, I do not believe it is in the best interest of local communities to have community services directed by the Federal Government. The communities themselves know what types of programs would be most appropriate, all areas being diverse with different needs. It is inconceivable that direction at the Federal level would be effective in all communities.

Second, before Congress authorizes new programs for the next 5 years and spends hundreds of millions of dollars, it would be helpful to know whether or not those programs will be effective. If we must mandate such things, it would be much wiser to do so for a shorter time period to ensure they will be beneficial.

Third, it is not the Federal Government's responsibility to mediate between volunteers and local service providers, which is exactly what will happen if this bill passes. I believe Congress has better things to do with its time.

Further, if we begin paying volunteers to participate in community services, it will create a tremendous disincentive for those who truly volunteer their services. These are the people that we are trying to encourage—caring American citizens.

And finally, all this Federal intervention at the local level will only create further bureaucratic regulations and redtape in the daily lives of Americans—a clearly undesirable achievement.

Obviously, Congress needs to take another look at this issue. Let us not make the common mistake of legislating without really considering the impact of our actions on those we are here to represent.

Mr. President, I also thank the Senator from Texas for his amendment.

I want to make two points in my remarks in the short time that I have, which continue on the line of what the distinguished Senator from Texas said about the comments the Senator from Minnesota made earlier. I think it is appropriate that this amendment be on this bill. This bill will end up costing $1.2 billion, I believe.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM, on page 92 of the report, files her views. She says:

My opposition to this legislation is based on two main concerns: first, the $300 million authorized for service programs is a substantial sum of money. Should such additional funds become available, they would be spent more effectively on programs such as Head Start.

I just met with a group of constituents from my State who are asking for a meager amount of $300,000 to continue some important research on feed grains, barley specifically, in the Pacific Northwest, at Washington State University, and the University of Idaho. This money is competition to that.

Mr. President, I think the Senator from Texas is absolutely correct. If there is a peace dividend, the safest thing for the American people is to return this money to them. I have said all year this country would be better off if the Congress of the United States would pass a continuing services budget, allow the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings sequester to kick in to force the balanced budget, adjourn the Congress, and return next January. The country would be better off because everything we are going to pass is going to cost money and it is going to add regulations to the cost of doing business in the country for very little good.

We have a massive, expensive clean air bill coming up. Everyone wants to be recorded as being for the environment, so it will probably pass. That is one of the reasons we had the recession in the late seventies and early eighties because this country was aggressively adopting the 1977 Clean Air Act amendments. That is something that is not often talked about, but it had a great deal to do with the depths of the recession that went on in this country in the late seventies and the early part of the eighties.

Mr. President, I want to say one other thing with respect to the peace dividend. For a brief period of 5 years, the United States from 1981 through 1985 spent 1.5 percent more of our GNP on defense spending than we had previously. During that 5-year period, we literally demonstrated to the Soviet Union they could not compete with us in the arms race, and we have seen a massive revolt of people across the world seeking freedom. We have seen the Berlin Wall come down. We have seen people emboldened in Nicaragua to vote out a Communist government just this week. Why? Because they perceive the United States as strong. They have great hope in their hearts with the fact the United States has helped the people in Panama to throw out the dictator and put in the people they legitamately elected.

Mr. President, I call to the attention of my colleagues, now that we are talking about the so-called post-Vietnam peace dividend, and I agree with Senator GRAMM's wording. If there is a peace dividend, the worst thing this Congress can do is add fuel to what the news media has already done.

I want to quote Ray Cline from the book "Behind the Smile Are Teeth of Iron." This is not Ray Cline's quote:

"Behind the smile are teeth of iron" are the actual words used to describe Mikhail Gorbachev by former Soviet President Andre Gromyko, the perennial Communist Foreign Minister who died in 1989 after being summarily ousted from office.

Mr. President, I want to quote in the foreword of this book:

A brilliantly conducted public relations campaign by Mikhail Gorbachev, abetted by the enthusiastic (and unprecedented) cooperation of the U.S. news media, has convinced most Americans that the Cold War is over and a long period of peaceful relations with the Soviet Union lies ahead.

I hope that is true, Mr. President. But I think we should be extremely cautious of where we are going and be extremely mindful of what has happened.

I heard the sophistry on the floor of my friend from Tennessee talking about how the tax rates are now titled so that the rates have gone down for the wealthy. The sophistry of it is he does not tell the people in that speech that the wealthy people in this country, the high-income people are paying for a bigger share of the Government.

It is true their rates are down, but they are not in tax shelters as they were at the end of the seventies. They are actually paying a bigger share of the cost that is coming into the Federal Government. That is the sophistry of that argument. There are 20 million more Americans working today than there were 7 years ago. They have good jobs and good opportunities and over half of those jobs can reach as high as $50,000 per year. So it is not low-income jobs that people are getting.

Mr. President, we should be extremely cautious, but we should also be very mindful of the fact, as the Senator from Texas points out, we are starting, with this bill that is before us today, the National and Community Service Act of 1989, another new program. It is another new program to go out and build another constituency of government. It is the same thing that has happened across the world. People are trying to get rid of big, oppressive government. Why should we follow that pattern in the United States when we have been the example for which they are reaching. We seem to be coming right in line to try to pass, as we say, Eastern-European-type programs. What we need are volunteer programs in the private sector like we formed in Idaho, called Working Partners.

I ask unanimous consent that pages 1 through 24 of "Behind the Smile Are Teeth of Iron" be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE REAL GORBACHEV

"Proposals for nuclear and conventional force reductions are flowing freely from Soviet officials. Hopefully they will eventually lead to something good. On the other hand, real-world trends in Soviet Strategic nuclear weapon deployments—the kind that directly threaten the United States—have little or no resemblance to Mikhail Gorbachev's soothing words."—Maj. Gen. Henry Mohr, (U.S.A. Ret.), Distributed by Heritage Features Syndicate, March 3, 1989.

Ever since the Soviet march towards increasing world power started, American leaders have repeatedly been misled into wishful thinking about their counterparts in the Kremlin.

At Yalta in 1945, President Roosevelt was optimistic about cooperating with "Uncle Joe" Stalin, a man who had exterminated well over twenty million of his fellow citizens. Roughly seven million Ukrainians were deliberately starved to death by Stalin in his farm collectivization program.

Jimmy Carter kissed Brezhnev on both cheeks in Moscow at the end of the 1970s just months before the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, an abortive act of political aggrandizement that resulted in over 1 million Afghans being killed.

President Reagan, after denouncing the Soviet empire as "evil," finally came to call Mikhail Gorbachev his "friend."

Is Gorbachev different from his predecessors, or is he the more skillful protege of Yuri Andropov, former head of the Soviet state and chief of KGB, the Soviet secret police, which has a seventy-year record that rivals Hitler's Gestapo in arrests, torture, imprisonment, and murder of millions?

Repeated images of a smiling, friendly Gorbachev on TV, a never ending flow of "peaceful" proposals, and ringing endorsements of the Gorbachev regime by opinion leaders in Europe and the United States have convinced most Americans that he is a new kind of Soviet leader. But is he? He is smooth and persuasive, but are his goals fundamentally different from those of Lenin, Stalin, Khrushchev, and Brezhnev?

"Despite Soviet rhetoric about 'democratization,' Gorbachev's specific reform proposals tolerate no opposition parties and have led chiefly to a greater consolidation of power in the hands of Gorbachev himself."—Center for Security Policy, Washington, D.C., January 25, 1989.

In Afghanistan, during Gorbachev's presidency, the Soviet military forces distributed mines disguised as toys, butterflies, small birds, and stones that maimed thousands of children. When the Soviet military forces pulled out, which they did at a leisurely pace, they left between ten and thirty million mines, some buried, some scattered randomly about the countryside, that will be killing people for many years. And, of course, Moscow still gives massive political, economic, and military aid to the communist regime in Kabul, hoping to frustrate the political goals of the mujahhedin freedom fighters who won on the battlefield but have not yet made much progress in the political arena. As a political presence, the Soviet Union is still very much in Afghanistan—a major power player in the great game of nations.

"Moscow is supporting Afghanistan's communist government with the largest military airlift in Soviet history, Western diplomatic sources said yesterday."

"The diplomats, who spoke on condition of anonymity, estimated Soviet military aid to Afghanistan during the first half of 1989 was worth more than $1.5 billion".—The Washington Times, October 4, 1989.

While Gorbachev talks of glasnost (openness) and new freedoms for Soviet citizens, he is keeping millions of people in harsh labor camps inside the Soviet Union. The U.S. news media rarely mention this fact, even though it is documented in official U.S. Government reports.

Much of the terrorism in the world has had Soviet support. For 20 years, the Soviets have provided training, explosives, guns, and material supplies to terrorists. Outrageously, in the spring of 1989, Gorbachev sold Muammar el-Qaddafi SU-24 bombers that enable Libya, the most determined terrorist state of the whole world, to threaten Israel's existence.

Several Soviet-backed nations provide direct support to drug traffickers. The most widely publicized examples are Cuba, Nicaragua, and Bulgaria. The vast majority of terrorists and armed revolutionary groups are Marxist-Leninist in ideology and cooperate with international narcotics cartels throughout the world. Their main purpose is making money. At the same time, however, they are happy to be damaging the social fabric of capitalist societies, and they are doing so.

Under Gorbachev, the Soviet Union continues to violate vitally important treaties, agreements, and understandings with the United States. This undisputed fact raises the question of the value of making new agreements with Moscow.

Under Gorbachev, the Soviet Union's efforts to acquire U.S. technology and vital defense secrets through theft and spying have risen to unprecedented levels.

And of special significance to every American is the fact that Gorbachev continues to produce vast quantities of new advanced-technology military weapons. He continues to modernize his armed forces, despite the financial strains the Soviet economy is undergoing at home and despite his repeated assurances that he wants only sufficient military strength for security. Five months after he said the Soviets would withdraw 10,000 tanks from Europe, the Soviet production of new tanks—according to American estimates—reached a record high of 1,025 in the first quarter of 1989 which if continued would be 4,200 new tanks per year. Soviet officials have said the production rate will be only about half that level, but it is unquestionably very high.

"Since Gorbachev took office the Soviets have fielded more tanks and artillery pieces than currently exist in the combined armies of Britain, France and West Germany."—General James Galvin, Supreme Allied Commander in Europe.

Deployments of new ICBM mobile missiles continue, and work proceeds on still another generation of strategic missiles—with the United States plainly the primary target.

As the facts in this book reveal, the Soviet threat continues to be real and menancing. Even though Gorbachev declares that the Soviet Union is no longer an enemy of the United States, the main obstacle to Soviet dominance in world politics is still the strength and national security preparedness of the United States. Communist party leaders have called the United States the main enemy for 70 years.

Gorbachev says his goal is restructuring the Soviet economy (perestroika). He is sincere about that because he is presiding over a failing economy. He needs foreign capital and technology to strengthen the socialist state and save the increasingly unpopular communist party bureaucracy. Yet, in November 1987, just before he conducted a wildly successful summit with President Reagan in Washington D.C., culminating in the signing of the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, Gorbachev said in a speech to Soviet leaders: "In October, 1917, we parted with the old world, rejecting it once and for all. We are moving toward a new world, the world of Communism. We shall never turn off that road."

In covering the speech for the American public, NBC TV News edited out these words. They evidently wanted to portray Gorbachev as a man with a new agenda somehow compatible with market economies and pluralist democracy. Many Americans are prone to wishful thinking.

Gorbachev's real agenda is preserving the political and economic power of the one-party dictatorship he now leads. He has seized more direct political control over the regime than any leader since Stalin.

Rhetoric aside, if he chose in earnest to undermine the basic structure of Leninist dictatorship, millions of privileged communist party bureaucrats, secret police, and military commanders would almost certainly force him to return to Lenin's goals or step aside.

We must remember that what Gorbachev is doing is far from new. In 1921, less than four years after the Russian revolution, Vladimir Lenin instituted the first Soviet perestroika, the New Economic Policy (NEP), inviting economic subsidies from capitalist countries. He wanted foreign money and technology, just as Gorbachev does, and Lenin engaged in an effort, for a few years successful, to confuse the capitalists as to his true intentions.

". . . the Soviets hope their reductions will diminish the West's perception of a Soviet threat while enhancing the reality of that threat. This is consistent with Soviet claims that the goal of Gorbachev's glasnost policy is to 'eliminate the enemy' of the USSR."—Committee on the Present Danger, Eugene Rostow, Chairman, September 5, 1989.

Under Joseph Stalin, who ruled the Soviet Union for nearly 30 years, the savage repression of Soviet citizens and the hostile attitude toward owners of private property everywhere became crystal clear. Yet, he too made conspicuous attempts, including nominal abolition of the Communist International, to lull the West into thinking the Soviet Union was turning away from spreading communism abroad. It never happened, and Stalin presided over the greatest expansion of Soviet power in history in the late 1940's, precipitating the "Cold War" for so many now hope is over.

In 1956, Nikita Khrushchev attacked the political style of Stalin, withdrew Soviet troops from occupied territory, announced cutbacks in the army and navy, altered Soviet strategic doctrine, promised wide-ranging political reforms, allowed the publication of anti-Soviet literature, released political prisoners, and invited the capitalists to do business with the Soviets. As described by several defectors with inside knowledge, the actions were all orchestrated to deceive the West into thinking the Soviet Union was changing, and enable the flow of foreign financial and technical assistance. Khrushchev's program is the model for what Gorbachev is doing today.

Between 1970 and 1975, Leonid Brezhnev undertook a glasnost policy of his own, which became known as "detente", and for years the West relaxed in a feeling that Soviet policies were turning favorable. The United States was also told by former communist officials who had defected that "detente" was a Soviet strategic intelligence operation, not intended to transform the one-party dictatorship. Their warnings were ignored and discredited .

Through all these periods of "relaxation" of international tension the Soviet threat continued to build, just as it is building today. The object has been to get Americans to relax so Soviet power could grow unopposed. It is necesssary to pay attention to military hardware, not only to words.

THE GIANT DECEPTION

"Gorbachev told the Congress People's Deputies in May that although he was cutting spending and reducing forces, the cuts would give "a new quality to the U.S.S.R. Armed Forces without any detriment to the country's defense capability."—Paul Wolfowitz, Undersecretary of defense policy, July 27, 1989.

The Soviet Union of Mikhail Gorbachev is a nation beset with social, ethnic, and financial troubles. This fact has led most Americans to think Soviet aggressive policies will be forced to change and will lead to "peace in our time," just as everyone hoped in 1939.

Most Americans believe Gorbachev's withdrawal from Afghanistan is evidence of his need to erase his financial problems at home, which is true. It is far from certain, however, that the withdrawal is permanent or that it wil permanently ease international tension.

"A senior Soviet official said today that the Kremlin had decided to provide the Afghan Government with whatever weapons were needed to defend its cities against guerilla attack.

The official, who is known to be in close contact with Mikhail S. Gorbachev, the Soviet leader, said the move was decided on after Moscow considered reinvolving Soviet forces in the Afghan war."—The New York Times, April 14, 1989.

Many European and American observers point to glasnost and perestroika a proof that Gorbachev is a new kind of Soviet leader, and to the labor and ethnic unrest in the Caucasus and in the Ukraine, as well as demands for reform in Soviet client states in Eastern Europe, as proof of Gorbachev's need to change to a policy of butter instead of guns.

But what are the facts? Contrary to what most Americans have been led to believe, under Gorbachev there is no indication yet of any decrease in military spending or in weapons production.

Most experts say the Soviet leaders are now spending between 15 and 20 percent of GNP on the military. By comparison, the United States spends about 6 percent of GNP. The truth is, no one knows exactly what the Soviet Union spends. Estimates made public in 1989 are still full of ambiguities and do not cover all expenditures. True costs are higher. The real Soviet military budget is still secret.

"Taking all defense-related spending into account, the Soviets devote roughly 23-28 percent of their GNP and roughly one-half of their state budget to military forces and military power."—Committee on the Present Danger, Eugene Rostow, Chairman, September 5, 1989.

We are told that the Soviet Union is in dire economic straits, that Gorbachev has changed his military forces from an offensive to a defensive doctrine, and that all he wants is reasonable sufficiency to protect the Soviet Union. But this is what Soviet leaders have been saying for 70 years. They have often been an economic basket case, but have continued to give first priority to the military forces and secret police, irrespective of how badly the population suffers.

As columnist Charley Reese askes, "if the Soviet economy is so bad, why are they keeping the military rates of expenditure so high? Why do they keep turning out so many weapons? If Gorbachev really intends to create a more open and democratic society, why do changes in the Soviet constitution concentrate even more power in the hands of Gorbachev? If American TV programs spent more time reporting facts and less time interviewing Soviet propagandists, perhaps the situation would be clearer to the American people."

"Although Gorbachev proposes to reduce the Soviet defense budget by 14.2 percent, since 1985 Soviet defense expenditures have increased by an average of 3 percent per year in real terms."—Soviet Military Power 1989, U.S. Department of Defense.

There is no better Soviet propagandist than Mikhail Gorbachev himself. In the United States and in Europe, a large majority of the public and political leadership have been taken in by his smile and his promises. Today, four out of five West Germans believe the Soviet threat is disappearing. Obviously, what is creating these impressions are the relatively minor military cutbacks in Europe and the massive Gorbachev-directed publicity campaign designed to influence the German people. There is nothing new about this approach. The Soviet Union spends over $4 billion yearly on active intelligence measures, primarily propaganda, to influence the West.

Gorbachev has promised to remove 10,000 tanks from Eurpoe. All the network TV news programs features this dramatic evidence of goodwill. What goes seldom reported is that the Soviet have over 50,000 main battle tanks and some 60,000 armored vehicles, and that the reduction amounts to little more than the retirement of the obsolescent portion of their stockpile. By removing his old tanks Gorbachev will actually increase the fighting power of his army.

The same can be said about his promise to cut force levels by 10 percent, which is less than 5 percent of the combined active and ready reserve. These cuts would have an imperceptible effect on Soviet military capabilities. How is one to judge the reductions?

During the past twenty years of negotiations on conventional force reductions, the Soviets have repeatedly lied about the number of forces in Eastern Europe and have also required their Eastern European satellites to report false troop strengths to the West European and U.S. negotiators.

The inescapable truth is that the Warsaw Pact has overwhelming superiority over NATO in tanks, artillery, aircraft, number of troops, and in modern and efficient chemical weapons military units. The announced cuts do not change the decided Soviet military superiority. If anything, the superiority will actually increase if NATO nations cut back on their defense spending in response to the publicity campaign associated with the Soviet announcements.

"Even if the Soviets completely eliminated the forces discussed in Gorbachev's 7 December 1988 United Nations' speech, Warsaw Pact forces would still out-number NATO in tanks, artillery, and divisions by a ratio of over 2 to 1."—Soviet Military Power 1989, U.S. Department of Defense.

Why does Gorbachev really need the military strength he is preserving? Through establishing both an image of friendship and the reality of massive military superiority, experts foresee the continued use of the "carrot and stick" approach. The Soviet plan is to eliminate from Europe all nuclear weapons by creating obstacles to modernization of NATO's remaining nuclear weapons, thus rendering Europe helpless against the Soviet Unions remaining massive European conventional superiority. And Gorbachev plans eventually to detach Europe politically and strategically from the United States, a high priority Soviet objective since the early 1950's.

Virtually every one of the many Gorbachev proposals which seem to advance the cause of peace are suspect or misleading.

Everywhere he goes, Gorbachev continues his "peace" proposals, all of which are duitifully reported to the American people by TV, radio, and newspapers. No one bothers to explain what the Soviet Union means by "peace," which Soviet ideologists since Lenin have insisted can be achieved only after all competing social systems, especially democracies, are destroyed and replaced by Marxist-Leninist societies.

When he visited Cuba in April 1989, Gorbachev called for an end to all outside military aid to Central America. The Soviet military subsidies to Cuba and Nicaragua continue. White House spokesman, Marlin Fitzwater, correctly responded, "While his words about not exporting revolution are welcome, they are not matched by deeds which would give those words credence."

"American experts on military affairs said today that President Mikhail S. Gorbachev's plan to remove nuclear-armed submarines from the Baltic Sea would not significantly change the balance of power between the Soviet bloc and NATO."

"John F. Lehman Jr., who served as Secretary of the Navy from 1981 to 1987, said Mr. Gorbachev was making a political virtue of a military and fiscal necessity. For years, Mr. Lehman said, Soviet admirals have wanted to retire the Golf-class submarines because they are 'ancient, rickety machines that add almost nothing to the military equation and are very expensive to maintain."—The New York Times, October 27, 1989.

ISOLATING THE UNITED STATES

"The Central Intelligence Agency reported earlier this year that in 1988 the Soviet Union supplied $515 million worth of military equipment to Nicaragua, the second-highest yearly total since the Kremlin began shipping weapons to Managua in 1980."—The Washington Post, May 16, 1989.

Few Americans have stopped to realize that the countries around the world that have fallen into Soviet hands and Soviet control are not randomly selected. They are all strategically located along sea lanes of commerce—Vietnam, Ethiopia, Yemen, Mozambique, Angola, Grenada, Cuba, and Nicaragua. They lie along or near chokepoints on sea passages vital to American trade with other nations.

One reason is that the Soviet goal is to separate the industrialized states from their foreign sources of strategic minerals, and to disrupt the sea lanes through which these economic resources move. Stalin explained this strategy nearly 40 years ago. Thus they hope in the long run to weaken the industrialized states and hasten the ultimate victory of Moscow-brand socialism. The communist states have not succeeded yet, but it is premature to believe they have abandoned their goal.

The destablization of capitalist societies is what is behind the political unrest in South Africa. Virtually never reported by the American press is that fact that the African National Congress, the organization behind the massive effort to overthrow the present government in Pretoria, is led by members of the Communist Party of South Africa and is financed and provided arms by Moscow. The goal is not only in the long run to obtain for the Soviet Union the vital minerals upon which U.S. military technology is heavily dependent, but also to control the critically important sea lanes around the tip of South Africa where the waters of the Atlantic and Indian Oceans converge.

In our part of the world alone the Soviet efforts to undermine American influence and create communist client states are massive. Gorbachev is now sending perhaps as much as $1 billion a year in military and economic aid to Nicaragua. The Sandinistas plan to expand their military forces to 600,000 by 1995. They have indicated a desire to upgrade their air power with fighter aircraft and more helicopters. In addition, they have talked about acquiring long-range artillery, armored personnel carrier, and anti-tank weapons, as well as greatly strengthening their navy with warships, patrol boats, minesweepers and hydrofoils. For a nation of three and one-half million people, these goals are rediculous—unless a threat to the sealanes leading to the Panama Canal is envisaged.

Sixty-five percent of the ships carrying goods to and from the United States pass through the Panama Canal, all within range of MIG-21s if they are stationed in Nicaragua.

Soviet-supported Cuba, where Gorbachev sends $7 billion a year, is already capable of interdicting U.S. ships passing through the Florida Straits—through which pass 45 percent of all U.S. exports and imports and 60 percent of U.S. resupply material to NATO.

"The Cold War cannot be won without the Soviet's renunciation of their claims upon other countries of the world. If they wish to renounce those claims, why do they continue to arm in such fashion as makes sense only if they harbor aggressive designs?"—William F. Buckley, Jr., June 7, 1989.

Whether it is south of our border, in the West Pacific, or Southern Africa, the Soviets are still staking out positions of strength to be exploited later by mounting a threat to American freedom of passage through the ocean chokepoints.

Gorbachev's goal is clear. He is sending $16 to $18 billion a year to maintain client governments. He is laying the groundwork for separating America from foreign sources of vital minerals and strategic supplies by distrupting the sea lanes upon which we and our European allies depend. In this way, he can dislocate our economy, weaken our ability to resist Soviet unterventions abroad, and speed the day when the United States will appear to most foreigners to be a second rate nation no longer more prosperous than the communist states and without the national will to defend American interests overseas.

Vital to the realization of this long range goal is for Gorbachev to move quickly to neutralize our entire nuclear deterrent, which he has made amazing progress toward doing.

SOVIET MISSILE SUPERIORITY

"Mr. Gorbachev's December proposal to cut the military forces by 500,000 was mostly symbolic, while the new "defensive posture" in Europe remains just a pledge. Meanwhile, every report we get is that new mobile intercontinental nukes like the SS-24 and SS-25 continue to roll off the production lines, as do Blackjack bombers armed with Cruise missiles, advances in anti-missile defenses, and submarines."—Robert Gates, former CIA Deputy Director, October 1988, reported in the Wall Street Journal, April 14, 1989.

Walter Cronkite of CBS News once explained the way the U.S. news media deal with defense matters: "There are always groups in Washington expressing views of alarm over the state of our defenses, We don't carry those stories. The story is that there are those who want to cut defense spending."

For years, the media have concentrated on news about defense department overspending, insider information peddling, criticism of the arms race, and news of U.S. weapons failures. Almost completely overlooked has been any comment about the massive arms build-up that was launched by Leonid Brezhnev and is still going on under Gorbachev.

For example, the Soviet leaders now have in their arsenal the most fearsome weapon of destruction ever devised by man. It is the SS-18, an intercontinental missile (IBCM) twice as large as the U.S. Air Force's largest and most modern missile, the MX (now known as Peacekeeper) and much, much larger than the standard American Minuteman missile. The SS-18 weighs 200 tons and is as high as a 10-story building. Each SS-18 can carry at least 10 warheads—each with destructive power exceeding half a million tons of TNT. It has sufficient range to be targeted on the entire United States.

At last report the Soviet military forces had 308 SS-18s in the field, carrying about 3,000 warheads. They also had 360 SS-19s and 150 SS-17s. On just these latter two weapons they have about 2,500 warheads. The destructive power in the deployed SS-18s alone is greater than the destructive power of the entire U.S. land-based missile force.

"Despite talk of reduced military budgets, Moscow still spends an estimated 15 to 17 percent of its GNP on defense, while the United States spends less than 6 percent."—Soviet Military Power 1989, U.S. Department of Defense.

And the Soviet ICBM build-up continues under Gorbachev. He has been deploying the new SS-25 for some time, and the 10-warhead SS-24 is in the initial stages of deployment. Both are mobile, which means they do not need to be deployed in a fixed site. The SS-24, which is the size of the U.S. Peacekeeper missile, of which we have only a few, is designed for both rail and silo deployment. The SS-25, about the size of a U.S. Minuteman missile, is transported by road.

The mobility of the new Soviet missiles makes a mockery of offers by Gorbachev to reduce his nuclear forces. We will never be able to tell how many SS-24s and SS-25s the Soviets have because they can be concealed in bunkers, hangars, factories, tunnels, or garages. U.S. reconnaissance satellites cannot see or count them if they are covered. Therefore we cannot target them.

"What security needs in the Soviet Union require this enormous number of ICBM warheads? The Soviet arsenal has long since passed the limits of any reasonable nuclear force aimed solely at deterrence of an American attack."—Robert Jastrow and James Frelk, George C. Marshall Institute.

Not long ago, the USSR successfully tested a follow-on to the SS-18, with even more accurate warheads. Finally, the Department of Defense has reported signs of a sixth generation of ICBMs—follow-ons to the SS-24 and SS-25, and also mobile. U.S. Secretary of Defense Harold Brown under President Carter said it best some years ago: "When we build, they build. When we stop building, they build." Gorbachev has promised to stop building but he is not stopping even though he already has a tremendous arsenal of intercontinental missiles 30 minutes away from every American city.

It is almost transparently clear, once the facts are known, that Gorbachev has other reasons for such a massive superiority. His aim is to intimidate Americans and thereby constrain the freedom of American decisionmakers to take risks in defense of the national security of the United States.

One of Gorbachev's aims is to have such overwhelming and threatening force as to prevent the United States from making any move to stop the Soviet Union from intervening in other countries and extending its hegemony wherever political and military vulnerabilities exist. This is not conjecture. This is directly stated by Soviet ideologists in their official writings.

American military power has forced Moscow to retreat from aggressive moves in earlier days. In 1956, when Khrushchev threatened to intervene in the Suez crisis NATO Commander Gruenther replied, "Moscow will be destroyed as night follows day." In that day it was true. Khrushchev backed away. When confronted by Kennedy in 1962, Khrushchev withdrew the missiles he was secretly deploying in Cuba. Today our options are more limited. We face a Soviet superiority in ICBMs with no defenses against them. Moscow has extensive active and passive anti-missile defenses. It has become dangerous and not very persuasive for the United States to threaten the Soviet Union with nuclear retaliation in view of the military capability of Gorbachev's armed forces. Our deterrent is diminished, if not totally gone.

But there is another, far worse challenge facing America—the prospect of an effective Soviet defense against incoming American missiles.

SOVIET MISSILE DEFENSES

"Nothing could be more dangerous to the security of the west and global stability than a unilateral Soviet deployment of a nationwide ABM system combined with its massive offensive missile capabilities."—Former Secretary of Defense, Caspar Weinberger.

There is no more convincing proof of the failure of the U.S. Government and the news media to get across to the public the facts about the dangers our country faces than the results of a recent poll. It shows that 64 percent of the American people believe our country has a defense against incoming nuclear missiles.

The truth is that the United States is completely, totally defenseless against a missile attack. We cannot prevent a single warhead, even one launched accidentally, from detonating on our country. We cannot even prevent nuclear warheads fired at us by a terrorist state like Libya or Iran from exploding on an American city at the will of a fanatic like Colonel Muammar Qaddafi.

In 1975 the Congress, relying on the arms agreements of the period of "detente" in the early 1970s, disbanded our only ballistic missile defense system and has allowed none to be built since.

The Soviet Union, on the other hand, today has 100 underground silos around Moscow loaded with Gazelle and modified Galosh missiles. The Gazelle can intercept missiles and warheads at the edge of space, and the Galosh can destroy them lower down in the earth's atmosphere. New hardened silos have been constructed for these missiles. The interceptor missiles are guided by an elaborate system of radars; one giant phased array radar, which can track large numbers of warheads, determines which targets they are aimed at, and then passes the instructions on to small radars which direct the interceptors to make the "kill."

The Moscow system in general is permissible under the ABM Treaty. On the other hand, this system is being designed and tested for rapid reload missiles, thus greatly extending its capability, in violation of the Treaty. Also, the U.S. government now knows that the Soviet Union has production lines for turning out components of the Moscow ABM system in large quantities despite the fact that their deployment in other areas is prohibited by the ABM Treaty.

"The Soviet Union has made a tremendous investment in air defenses. We have almost none in this country. We have very light air defenses in this country, which means we give Soviet bombers and cruise missiles essentially a free ride into U.S. air space."—Donald B. Rice, Air Force Secretary, September 27, 1989.

Already the Soviets have 9 giant phased-array radars with "faces" the size of 2 football fields located around the periphery of their country. Three more are under construction.

Each of the 12 will have the range and precision needed to pick up oncoming U.S. warheads as they approach the USSR, determine which target each warhead is headed for, and alert individual ABM sites in the warhead's path to send up a missile to intercept it.

"Taken together, all of the Soviet Union's ABM and ABM-related activities are . . . more ominous than anyone considered individually. Cumulatively, they suggest that the U.S.S.R. may be preparing an ABM defense of its national territory—the only missing element in their defenses."—1989 Strategic Defense Initiative Organization's Report to Congress.

A network of 12 battle management radars, combined with the facilities for mass production of ABM components, gives the Soviet Union the means for setting up a nationwide ABM defense if Moscow decides to break out of the ABM Treaty while the United States is still defenseless. Interceptor missiles are now being produced at Tyumen in Western Siberia. U.S. Air Force Intelligence has confirmed that the controlling radars are being mass produced at Gomel in the Byelorussian Republic.

Could U.S. bombers deal with the ICBM or ABM systems? The truth is that our old, slow flying B-52 bombers as well as our new B-1s depend on warning for survivability. In the event of a surprise attack (the preferred Soviet choice) many of the bombers stand a good chance of being destroyed on the ground. Those that survive will have to contend with Soviet long-range interceptors, and if the bombers penetrate Soviet air space they will face a sophisticated, in-depth air defense system, which includes some 9,000 surface-to-air (SAM) missile launchers and thousands of anti-aircraft guns. As for the B-2 stealth bomber, its $70 billion price tag for 132 bombers and its technological complexity indicate it is at least years from deployment at best, and Congress seems to be debating whether to slow the program or cancel it entirely.

In this past decade the Soviets have deployed about 150 SA-10 missile launch units around Moscow and major military industrial areas. They are testing a new SAM system, the SA-X-12B, which will be an all-altitude system. The SA-10 is the first Soviet SAM with any real capability against cruise missiles. They can already defend against low flying, slow flying cruise missiles with their large force of aircraft with look-down, shoot-down radar capability.

"The Soviets are still improving their strategic nuclear capabilities. They are hardening facilities, making many of their forces mobile, have plans to disperse their military forces in time of crisis and continue to maintain the world's only recently upgraded anti-ballistic missile system"—(Adm.) C.A.H. Trost, Chief of Naval Operations, Sept. 16, 1989.

In these circumstances, the main retaliatory force that might survive a first strike against the United States is the latest U.S. strategic submarine, the Ohio class, which can launch Trident II nuclear missiles carrying 10 warheads from secret underwater locations remote from the Soviet Union. Navy sources maintain the Ohio class submarine will be invulnerable into the indefinite future.

The USSR now has in operational status more than 200 attack submarines. Since only 10 or 12 U.S. Trident submarines will actually be at sea at any time in the 1990's, the Soviet Navy could assign four or five attack submarines to each Trident to trail it from the time it leaves port, keeping it in a box from which it would be very hard to escape . . . and hence would be in danger of being destroyed.

"A (Soviet) nuclear submarine is launched every 7 weeks and a conventional type every 10 weeks."—Jane's Underwater, Warfare Systems 1989-90.

Any one of these Soviet defense activities is cause for concern. The United States still abides by the ABM Treaty. Thus the Soviet Union of Mikhail Gorbachev could be preparing a strategic breakthrough by establishing a nationwide defense against U.S. missiles while we are still defenseless against their missiles. If this situation ever comes about, the United States is in peril.

SOVIET MILITARY CONTROL OF SPACE

"Glasnost has led to a variety of new public reports on the Soviet space program. These reports, however, have been highly selective and continue to downplay the largely military orientation of Soviet space systems and operations."—Soviet Military Power 1989, U.S. Defense Department.

The Soviet Union's massive efforts to achieve a nationwide defense against ballistic missiles, cruise missiles and gravity bombs are enough to alarm the public. Soviet developments in military use of space compound the worry about strategic stability and a possible future conflagration. The space-oriented military efforts are closely related to defense of the Soviet Union and are a direct threat to the United States. As we have seen over and over in this book, the public is largely ignorant of what is going on.

A high-ranking defector reported that control of the cosmos (space) was made a high priority research and development activity shortly after the Cuba missile crisis and at the time of the big Soviet missile build-up in the 1970s.

The Soviet Union has conducted a propaganda effort accusing the United States of military efforts in space. Meanwhile, according to a Defense Department report, the Soviet Union "operates some 50 types of space systems for military and civilian uses, including space stations . . . and reconnaissance, launch-detection, navigational, meteorological and communications satellites." They are also developing space systems designed to support military operations on the earth.

On January 25, 1989, The Center For Security Policy in Washington issued a report which stated, "The sustained commitment and breadth of the Soviet space program is overwhelming . . . The Soviet space program is aimed at enduring military control of space; it stands in direct contradiction of the Soviet charge against the United States concerning the 'militarization of space' and throws into question the sincerity of the USSR's diplomatic initiative ostensibly aimed at preserving space solely for peaceful purposes."

"The Soviets have deployed 50 killer satellites capable of sweeping every U.S. and NATO military satellite from the sky in a single week."—General Thomas Krebs, former Chief of Space Systems Analysis, U.S. Defense Intelligence Agency.

For missions designed to put weapons in space the Soviet SL-X-17 heavy lift space launch vehicle can lift payloads almost 4 times heavier than the U.S. space shuttle. A Department of Defense report says, "potential payloads include modules for a large space station, components for manned and unmanned interplanetary missions and perhaps directed-energy and anti-satellite and ballistic missile defense weapons."

The USSR puts about 120 to 130 payloads into orbit each year, requiring about a hundred space launches. The total weight probably exceeds 600,000 pounds, the equivalent of twenty space shuttle missions.

Another Defense Department publication concluded: "Today we face a situation in which the Soviets can negate many critical U.S. space assets while their space systems that would support their offensive military operations enjoy a sanctuary in space. This situation does not contribute to a stable deterrence."

The Soviet Union of Mikhail Gorbachev clearly means in the long run to have superiority in space. This is happening despite all the promises and assurances to the contrary. It is happening without the American people being told of the truly grave long term significance these developments can have.

"The most striking feature of Soviet military power today is the extraordinary momentum of its offensive strategic nuclear force modernization."—Richard B. Cheney, U.S. Secretary of Defense September, 1989.

One warning the American public has not heard much about came from former U.S. Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger on February 2, 1988. "For three decades, the Soviets have been building an impressive capability to support the 'terrestrial' armed forces with space-based systems. They have built the infrastructure needed to fight a war from space, and more recently, to fight a war in space. We must understand and appreciate these developments and consider their implication for our national security." This warning of long-range challenge to national security needs to be known by every American.

THE CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL THREAT

This multipolar world is not "necessarily going to be a safer place than the cold war era from which we are emerging, given the existence and indeed proliferation of weapons of mass destruction."—Lawrence S. Eagleburger, Deputy Secretary of State, In The New York Times, Sept. 16, 1989.

The Soviet chemical and biological threats are of a different strategic dimension and not so immediately aimed at the United States, but they are in some ways as frightening as the Soviet nulcear threat. The Soviet capability for deploying chemical and biological weapons is ten to a thousand times greater than that of the United States. The United States has very little effective defenses against such weapons. Soviet scientists have made a massive effort to apply genetic engineering and biotechnology to chemical and biological warfare. The United States acts as if it were oblivious to the enormous scientific developments in these areas that will affect our security more and more as time passes and even now pose an immense threat to our NATO allies in Western Europe.

The United States has no capability because Americans, civilians and military, sensibly dislike the very idea of chemical and biological warfare. We set about unilaterally to disarm in these fields in 1969 and have never built up a serious capability—apart from a modest potential for making new binary weapons that were offered to NATO and rejected. Our strategic planners have ignored intelligence warnings of Soviet capabilities since 1969 and have made U.S. security dependent primarily on arms control negotiations and treaties, notwithstanding Soviet violations of such agreements.

The chemical and biological threats are serious because of the revolutionary developments in the underlying science and technology. They are frightening because modern agents can be used covertly and disguised to mimic naturally occurring diseases. The potential threats demand action, most of all because Soviet leaders, on the basis of their past record, seem to have no moral qualms against using the weapons. Indeed, they have been testing and using them in areas remote from foreign view, particularly in Afghanistan.

Chemical weapons have been used by other nations—Iraq, Iran, Ethiopia, and Chad. Considerable publicity has been focused recently on the growing number of Middle East chemical weapons. They are especially ominous when coupled with the deployment of intermediate range ballistic missiles by some of these nations, including Libya and Iran.

While these developments are frightening and deserving of attention, far more serious developments are taking place within the Soviet Union.

Clearly the Soviet Union of Mikhail Gorbachev has the capability for the mass use of such weapons in a regional conflict anywhere in Eurasia. A Defense Intelligence Agency report says the "Soviets have vaccines or antidotes for many of the diseases that they might use in a BW (Biological Warfare) attack. These include those for anthrax, tularemia, plague and botulism."

Frank Gaffney, formerly a senior member of the U.S. Defense Department, writes, "Today the United States has neither offensive BW capabilities nor even any appreciable capacity to defend itself against biological first-use by an adversary."

Chemical and biological weapons have become the most sophisticated weapons imaginable and the potential for auxiliary military of clandestine use are just beginning to emerge.

Unfortunately the U.S. has made no signficant effort to analyze either what needs to be done, what can be done, or what the Soviet Union is doing. U.S. thinking in chemical and biological warfare is twenty years behind, and Americans simply are talking about bans rather than defenses. A Soviet threat to use these weapons of mass destruction or, more likely, some unidentifiable but highly covert employment of this capability would send a shockwave of panic through any targeted state or population group.

Lest we feel confident that the impact of nuclear weapons on public consciousness will prevent conflicts from reaching a military showdown, the Soviet armed forces' ability to deploy chemical and biological weapons at any point on their periphery in Eurasia suggests the United States must keep its guard up and its deterrent weapons ready. Our strategic defense vulnerability is a most urgent problem in light of the vast array of Soviet missiles.

A SCENARIO FOR SOVIET VICTORY

The development of small high-accuracy nuclear weapons means that the enemy can launch a surprise attack that decapitates the opponent's command structure and destroys the bulk of his forces, leaving him "strategically crippled, capable of only a spasmodic, disorganized and strategically aimless response—or none at all."—Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski.

Why, despite the desperate condition of the Soviet economy, is Gorbachev spending so much of Soviet GNP on the Soviet military and continuing to increase the numbers of advanced technology weapons of many kinds that are already far more numerous than similar weapons in the United States?

Why is he building the main elements of a nationwide "Red Shield" missile defense? Why does he move towards military control of space? Why does he keep building nuclear missiles so far in excess of what he claims to be "reasonable sufficiency?"

Is it Gorbachev or simply the momentum of a centrally controlled state that has always viewed military power as its greatest geopolitical asset? Does it make any difference what Gorbachev thinks if the military teeth are there behind the smile?

Is it possible that what happened before World War II is happening again? Is Gorbachev, much like Hitler in the 1930s, deftly and brilliantly taking actions and making proposals that alternately alarm and reassure the world that he wants peace? Is the object to cause the United States to lower its guard by cutting back on military preparedness? Is the Soviet Union positioning itself so that at some not too distant time it will be able to threaten a credible first strike against the United States?

Major propaganda efforts have been undertaken in many quarters to convince the West that nuclear war is simply impossible because of the massive force of nuclear explosions and resulting fallout. Yet, the development of high accuracy missiles means that targets can be destroyed with much lower-yield warheads, while each missile can carry greater numbers of warheads. Known and located targets can now be destroyed with relative ease. Peace rests on the balance of military strike forces and the awareness of decision-makers and public alike in the democracies that weakness leads to blackmail and surrender. Although there is no indication that the Soviets have ever targeted cities to destroy people, millions of American's certainly would die if military targets were actually attacked. In the high-stakes game of cashing in on military superiorty, there is no need to destroy cities. It is the fear of their being attacked or the possibility of retaliatory weapons being neutralized that will determine what happens. Clearly, because of its restraint, the United States is more vulnerable in any real confrontation.

"The Soviet military has made clear its enormous interest in the new technologies of guidance and precision, and will have the capability to destroy military targets in the United States with low-yield nuclear weapons.

"This means that fewer weapons are needed to attack military targets, and collateral damage to civil society can be held to very low levels or totally avoided."—Discriminate Deterrence Report of The Commission On Integrated Long Term Strategy, January 1988.

Soviet military writers for a long time have been fascinated with the concept of a surgical first strike—a surprise attack that decapitates the opponent's command structure and destroys the bulk of his forces, leaving him "strategically crippled, capable of only spasmodic, disorganized and strategically aimless response—or none at all." For the amoral military planner, a first strike is simply "a viable option." While Soviet writers usually carefully say the United States is the likely country to launch a first strike, they are—for whatever the reason—clearly thinking seriously about the concept and outlining the enormous advantages a first stike would confer.

In this situation, it is incredible that U.S. policy cannot decide whether to build missile defenses, or to maintain an adequate civil defense system, or even to invest very heavily in a command, control, and communications system designed to survive in a nuclear war. This is not true of the Soviet Union, which has devoted as much effort to defense and survivability as they have to offense over the years. Indeed, their efforts have been so extensive that many elements of the Soviet leadership, command and control systems as well as strike forces are likely to survive a U.S. retaliatory strike. This is true even if you discount the potential shield provided by Soviet ballistic defense deployments.

To a Soviet Union beset by unrest at home, facing an upsurge of nationalism among the captive nations of Eastern and Central Europe, and rebelliousness among its own national minorities and workers, the resort to a strategy of threatening a first strike may one day seem to be irresistible to beleagued Soviet leaders.

Gorbachev—deliberately or under pressure of the momentum of a militarized command system—seems to be taking all the correct measures necessary to prepare for a day when the Soviet Union, facing the signs of collapse of a 70 year old campaign to achieve a dominant role in world affairs, can threaten in one strike to knock out the only country standing in the way of that goal. If the United States and its allies recoil from the threat and submit to blackmail, Gorbachev could almost overnight provide his people with economic booty from the European community that would then be at his mercy.

"Undeniably, major political changes are taking place in the Soviet Union. It is not clear, however, that these changes have yet, or will, reduce the threat posed by the Soviet military. Despite all the talk of new thinking in foreign and defense policy and despite all the real actions for domestic reform, the Soviets continue to improve their military forces, which are already the world's largest."—Richard Cheney, U.S. Secretary of Defense, May 1, 1989.

Whether or not Gorbachev actually has such a game plan, the temptation for his successors would be overwhelming to grab power by mounting a challenge—perhaps a bluff, but a meancing one—to the classical capitalist enemies of the communist state.

"Nothing could be more shortsighted for the West today than to run down its defense unilaterally at the first sign of more peaceful and stable relations between the East and West."—Margaret Thatcher, quoted in William Buckley column.

If the United States begins now to lower its guard by reducing its own deterrent military strength, Americans will in due course have only a choice between acquiescing to nuclear blackmail or accepting a devastating attack on our major defense installations. In either case, Gorbachev or some successor to his post is very likely to be in a position to assure the fulfillment of his promise made to the Soviet communist leadership in 1987, "We shall never turn off that road . . . to a "new world, the world of Communism."

The scenario of how this strategic game could be be started is alarmingly simple. The necessary ingredients Gorbachev or any other paramount leader need to make it possible are already falling into place.

The U.S. satellites on which we depend for early warning of nuclear attack can be destroyed, as can the communications satellites on which our ICBMs depend for guidance. Twenty years ago this kind of preliminary attack would have been considered cause to launch an American attack on Soviet military targets. But not necessarily today. It may be we can no longer afford to initiate a broad preventive attack. Certainly there would be divided counsels in NATO on how to respond to a Soviet demarche. Soviet leaders believe we can only react with words if they hold in reserve an overwhelming capacity to destroy American military weapons—and, if necessary, American cities.

An attack by the Soviet Union on our space satellite vehicles would leave us blind and vulnerable to a wide variety of Soviet military options. Soviet military forces have already tested weapons to attack these satellites. If current Soviet trends persist, and the U.S. Congress continues to weaken our nuclear triad and prevent our country from having a missile defense while the Soviets complete theirs, eventually the Soviet Union will have sufficient strength in space to challenge Washingron. What choice would the United States have if the Soviet Union threatened to attack military payloads, early warning satellites, and a communications platforms in space all probably in the name of "preserving space for peaceful purposes?" No overt military act would be needed to bring the world to a terrifying crisis in the face of such a threat.

"In contrast to the recent Soviet announcement that total defense spending in 1989 will be 77.3 billion rubles, Western estimates in current rubles would put Soviet defense spending at roughly 150 billion rubles."—Soviet Military Power 1989, U.S. Department of Defense.

The tragedy is that unless major changes in the American public's awareness of the danger occurs, the answer will continue to be what it is today—we have no good response when such a demarche would be credible from the Soviet Union.

American officials would know at that point that an attack on space vehicles might be followed by limited attacks aimed at neutralization of top U.S. strategic leadership. What would we do if there were also evidence of clandestine dissemination of bacteriological contaminants, such as a new type of flu virus appearing on the United States, perhaps threatening to immobilize the nation just as happened from natural causes in 1917?

Held in reserve, then, as a blackmail threat, with the conviction it would never need to be used, would be the nuclear strike, which everyone would know could in fact be delivered by the Soviet Union at the least expected time, masked by deception and disinformation. Soviet leaders would not need to threaten very much very specifically. Fear would trigger the crisis and might immobilize democratic capitals if the military balance has been allowed to change for the worse.

Under such an anticipated attack, U.S. based ICBM forces, our bomber force, and at least 50 percent of the submarine force in port could be destroyed. The prospects for battle would then focus on the remaining elements of the U.S. submarine force, which might not know too clearly what was happening. Both Moscow and Washington, woud know in that circumstance that the limited, ragged response we could then make might be substantially neutralized by a Soviet missile defense system.

It is almost certain in such dire circumstances that U.S. government officials would sense a loss of resolve and will, making it hard for anyone, even the President, to make decisions potentially so disastrous for our people.

The mind recoils from the possibility of this kind of "bolt out of the blue," but the danger is precisely what now may be becoming a reality. Our strategic policy appears to be driven by budget problems and Soviet propaganda about "detente" and peace. All Americans are under enormous pressure to join the surge to weaken U.S. military capability—even the administration, the Congress, the military services, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, which are already acquiescing in reducing many elements of our military strength. Few seem to be demanding the maintenance of U.S. strategic security—at lest on one with the power to take corrective actions. Yet a few years of American slowdown and Soviet military modernization raises the specter of the kind of Soviet victory here outlined.

"The country stands before the necessity of making a cardinal change of direction. This could lead to the right or to the left. In such a dangerous situation, any thing is possible, even a military, fascist takeover."—Andrei D. Sakharov, in the New York Times, June 24, 1989.

There is no way to be sure what secretive and dictatorial leadership in Moscow will do some day if faced with the dilemma of seeing the communist system crumble or exploiting its military might to humble the capitalist democracies. The right answer is easy. The United States must avoid sliding into the danger of vulnerability to first strike blackmail and ultimate Soviet geopolitical victory.

THE WORST CRIME

"The worst crime is not to tell the truth to the public."—Winston Churchill, prior to World War II.

Why is Mikhail Gorbachev promoting glasnost (openness) and trying to depict the Soviet Union as a friend, not an adversary? Why also does he continue to spend a staggering amount of money on new and advanced arms? The answer is that he is in a race against time.

A front page story in the New York Times of March 9, 1989, reported, "Nationalism in the Ukraine, which is the Soviet Union's breadbasket and industrial engine, is surely high on Mikhail Gorbachev's list of nightmares as Soviet leader." There is widespread dissatisfaction among the Ukrainians, just as there are demands for greater freedom in the Baltic states annexed by Stalin, and ethnic unrest in Georgia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Uzbekistan.

Dr. Alan Keyes, former U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. under Jeane Kirkpatrick, says the Soviet Union might one day self-destruct under the mounting pressures of ethnic nationalism and economic stagnation. Zbigniew Brzezinski warns that the Soviet economic crisis is worsening and consumer unrest is rising.

Does Gorbachev intend to permit the Communist dream of 70 years to self-destruct? Not very likely! Moreover, is it not possible that those who oppose Gorbachev will seize power, perhaps led by Viktor Chebrikov and his KGB colleagues or the general still in the wings who were ousted by Gorbachev as leaders of the still powerful Soviet armed forces?

Momentous changes are occurring in the USSR, but it is not wise to engage in wishful thinking about fundamental systematic changes for the better. Probably Gorbachev himself cannot predict exactly what will happen, and neither can we.

While it is wise to encourage developments toward economic and political reform in the Soviet Union, it is also clear that a highly militarized one-party dictatorship will be a geopolitical and military threat to the United States. As the facts and photos in this book make clear, the American people must not allow themselves to be lulled by promises from Gorbachev. If Americans are innocent of the truth, our people will be much like the uninformed citizens who blundered into World War II 50 years ago, or the guileless Americans of the early postwar years who sobered up about Soviet geopolitical ambitions only when confronted with the Berlin Blockade and the Korean War.

"It is absurd to suggest that they must go on spending at anything like the current rate to protect themselves."—Richard Perle, Assistant Secretary of Defense under President Reagan.

The answer is not throwing more dollars at weapons systems but a strategy of maintaining a competitive economic-technical and politico-military balance of power compatible with American economic growth and social stability. The answer is in paying attention to facts about potential conflict and paying the price to protect our security.

Winston Churchill used the words at the beginning of this chapter to describe how he felt about keeping the English people in the dark about Nazi Germany's massive military build-up.

After the war, and millions of casualties later, Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin admitted, "Supposing I had gone to the country and said that Germany was rearming and that we must rearm, does anybody think that this pacific democracy would have rallied to that cry at that moment? I could not think of anything that would have made the loss of the election from my point of view more certain."

His successor, Neville Chamberlain, was the man who in 1938 spoke of "peace in our time." These short-sighted politically expedient attitudes cannot be tolerated by Americans in the world situation today.

The facts in this book make clear that history may be repeating itself, yet can be changed for the better if Americans are given the facts in time.

"While we hope to move beyond containment, we are only at the beginning of our new path. Many dangers and uncertainties are ahead. We must not forget that the Soviet Union has acquired awesome military capabilities. That was a fact of life for my predecessors, and that's always been a fact of life for our allies. And that is a fact of life for me today as President of the United States."—George Bush, May 12, 1989

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I yield 7 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the chair. I thank the Senator from Texas for giving me this most ample time. I congratulate him for bringing up this issue so we can have what I think is a most timely and serious discussion. We should begin it now, not later, not after the fact.

Before I get into some of my points, I want to offer a few housekeeping comments, just as did the Senator from Texas.

First, I think it is curious that there are those who say we should not have this debate on this particular bill. I have never noticed this body being overly concerned about germaneness or whether one amendment should go to a particular bill or another one.

This debate is timely. That is the important thing. It is a timely discussion, and I think certainly a case can be made and has been made that this is a good place for this discussion, as to what we are going to do with the money we will have in the future. So I see no problem with bringing it up now. In fact, I think it is essential that we begin this discussion throughout America and between parties and between both bodies in the Capitol.

Awhile ago I could not believe some of the things I was hearing. I could not help but believe it was a revision of history, of the way things actually occurred in the 1980's. You can come up with statistics until you are blue in the face, but I do not think you can disprove that the 1980's happened to be one of the best periods of years we have had in this century. The key statistics are there: Inflation came down, interest rates came down, unemployment came down. So many things were good in the 1980's.

Perhaps you could come up with some statistic here or there to support: "Well, it was not as good as it could have been." But it was good, and the American people thought it was good. They said so in 1984, and they said it again in 1988. I believe if we will do the right thing to keep our economy growing and our Nation moving, they are going to say the same thing again in 1992 and in the future.

When someone stands up in this body and says the President spent $298 billion on defense, that's not accurate. The President does not spend one nickel on defense that this institution does not approve and usually cut. We can go back and come up with a lot of statistics on that, too, going all the way back to Jimmy Carter and the Congresses when he was President. The Congress, time and time again, cut his requests.

I do not think we are going to be able to go back and make the 1980's look bad. Let us not talk about history. We are here. It is now. There are some wonderful things happening. Let us talk about how we can take advantage of our current climate.

I do still believe very strongly one comment I heard earlier, that certainly unlimited opportunity is not well served by unlimited government. I believe the Senator from Texas said that. That is what we are talking about.

I do not like for us to call it a peace dividend. I keep reminding myself—the Senator from Florida always says this—peace without freedom is not very much. So if we are going to call it something, let us call it a freedom dividend. With that I feel more comfortable.

The question is: Will there really be a freedom dividend? If so, how and when? As a member of the Armed Services Committee, I can report that we are working on that right now. We are trying to assess the threat. We are trying to see if we can get the Pentagon to help us develop a strategic plan, to see what we can do systematically, cautiously, and capably, looking at what is being done in Eastern Europe, what the Soviets are doing. Are the Soviets going to do what they say they are going to do?

In a lot of important areas there is still a lot to be done. I do not think we should rush headlong into the future. I do think we are going to reduce defense spending. The President, through the Secretary of Defense, already has recommended some changes. But I do not think we are going to get a big chunk of money this year. It is not going to happen even if we cut out major programs. Reductions in spending will spin out over a period of years. If you start trying to get multibillions of dollars this year, you will be cutting into manpower, readiness, and some other very important areas.

We need to emphasize that there is not going to be much of a freedom dividend this year. It is going to be in the outyears, and we need to be careful when we do get it.

Now, what should be done with the money? We will go back to our respective States. I tell you what I hear in my State, the poorest State in the Nation, by the way. The people down there still do not think that deficits are OK. Back home in Mississippi they still think you must live within your means. I spoke to my State house of representatives just a couple of weeks ago, and I commended them because they do a better job than we do. Poor as they are, with all the many needs they have, they balance their budget every year. And they think we ought to do the same.

So when we start setting these priorities, it is very important that we continue to work at chopping down that deficit and getting rid of the national debt before we start spending this tremendous bonanza that we may or may not have.

Does anybody ever think about the national debt? Would there ever be a consideration of dealing with that national debt or is it just really a nonexistent thing up here—too big to comprehend, so we will forget about it?

At the very minimum let us get the budget deficit down to zero. I still believe that counts. I believe in people power. We can argue back and forth about where we are going to spend our money and what the people would do with it and different types of tax changes, but I just have to wonder: You talk about getting back to the people. That really counts. How about the idea of reducing and eliminating the tax on the incomes of people after they retire? That seems like a good idea.

There are several proposals the Senator from Texas has outlined—places where we can make changes—which we should really consider.

I still maintain that a reduction in the capital gains tax benefits all people. Tell the elderly couple who would like to sell their residence that they are in the upper income bracket and have to pay a tremendous capital gains tax on the sale. That is something on which we should focus.

What about personal exemptions? Percentagewise, we do not give people as much of personal exemption now as we did in the 1940's. I believe in returning the power back to the people and letting them make some decisions about where that money should be spent.

Yes; there are important national priorities. We need to spend money to fight the war on drugs. We are not doing nearly enough there. Crime is a tremendous problem, in the District of Columbia and across the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator has expired.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I yield 1 additional minute.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the Senator. We do have these priorities, but there is plenty of room in the proposal before us to deal with that—a 3- to 5-percent increase a year, a $30 to $50 billion increase each year that we can spend for such priorities. Believe me, if the money is there, the Congress is going to be inclined to spend it. But we must set some priorities and deal with those priorities. That is vital because a lot of what we spend money for is not in the drug area or crime or education or infrastructure it is for private programs like this one. I would urge my colleagues to develop a plan of where we are going with this freedom dividend.

I thank the Senator for the additional time.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise in support of Senator GRAMM's amendment to return the peace dividend to America's families by cutting their taxes. Now more than ever, the working men and women of America need a tax cut.

From 1955 to 1988, the Federal tax burden on middle-income Americans rose twice as fast as their income.

In 1955, a median-income family of four paid annual Federal taxes at a rate of: 9 percent; in 1970—16 percent; in 1988—24 percent.

Despite the Reagan tax cuts which reduced income taxes for working families and removed millions of the working poor from the tax rolls, the American family is still overtaxed.

According to the Tax Foundation, a moderate-income family—two workers earning $45,000 with two dependent children—faces a total Federal tax bill of $12,938 for 1990. This includes income, payroll, and excise taxes.

These excessive taxes have stuck at the heart of the American family. The costs of child raising—child care costs, health, housing, college education—have increased dramatically. Congress has responded by creating more Government programs for middle-income families, like Head Start and the Act for Better Child Care. These programs require more money—and lots of it—so the tax burden on these families goes up.

We're widening the gap between what Americans earn and what the Government lets them keep—and that's unacceptable.

The emergence of the peace dividend provides an opportunity to turn back this tide. Ideally, we should use the peace dividend to reduce the deficit—but our experience with the Vietnam war dividend shows that Congress will immediately spend it. And more spending will eventually lead to higher tax burdens in the future.

So let's give that money back to the American family. We should further cut marginal tax rates. We should boost incentives to save and invest by enacting a revenue-winning cut in the capital gains tax and expanding IRA's.

We should repeal the Social Security earnings limit on America's seniors and reduce the payroll tax burden on America's working families.

Mr. President, let's turn the peace dividend into an opportunity dividend. Only by restoring control of the economy to individual Americans can we ensure continued prosperity for all Americans.

I urge the adoption of the Gramm amendment and I yield the floor.

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. President, the first vote will be on the Sasser proposal that states it is the sense of the Senate that funds saved as a result of the reductions in military expenditures shall be used in addressing the problems that we are facing in balancing the budget, in meeting basic needs, and also tax relief for working men and women.

I am very hopeful that that particular proposal will gain as much support as possible when we vote in less than a half-hour.

I believe that if I were writing this resolution, I would certainly have supported working out some figures to bring some life into that particular resolution. Hopefully, the Budget Committee as it moves toward its deliberations, will bring the question of a peace dividend to the floor of the Senate.

But I hope, since no figures are actually established here, we can gain a broad consensus of the Members of the Senate that will support that particular proposal. I think it has identified the areas which the great majority of the Members of the Senate can support. When we get that peace dividend, it will be targeted toward the budget, toward basic needs, and tax relief.

I quite frankly believe that it is justifiable to consider a 7-percent reduction in the military for 1991, and a 5-percent reduction for the 4 years that would follow. That would bring real spending in constant dollars to about $220 billion, or the $80 billion savings that the Senator from Tennessee has outlined.

That would bring military spending to where it was during the Eisenhower-Kennedy period, or the Nixon-Ford period; a time when the cold war was still hot, when there were dramatic moments and tensions in the relationship between the United States and the Soviet Union which there are not today. A $163 billion peace dividend is possible—and I wish we were voting on implementing that very measure this afternoon.

I think quite frankly it is justified, and I find it difficult, quite frankly, to understand why those that are supporting the Gramm measure equivocate on whether there is one.

As members of the Armed Services Committee, we heard the former three chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, all under President Reagan, say that the threat of military conflict has been substantially reduced. Three former Secretaries of Defense have stated the same.

There is not a hard-core Communist government left in Eastern Europe. The threat in the Persian Gulf has changed dramatically. Soviet troops are out of Afghanistan. There is movement in South Africa, and we have seen extraordinary changes in Central America.

Everything has changed around the world except President Bush's military budget. Everything, Mr. President. It is like nothing has happened around the world. It is like nothing has happened.

Why are we so reluctant to say that there has been a dramatic change, and it ought to be reflected in the size of our military budget?

We know that with these dramatic changes you hear those who say, well, they may be reversible. How are you going to reverse what has happened in Eastern Europe now? How are we going to see those kinds of alterations and changes?

We have had impressive testimony before the Armed Services Committee that said even if you are going to, President Gorbachev is not going to be out of office tomorrow. And if you put the hardest hardliner in the Soviet Union in office, it would be 2 to 3 years before the Soviet Union could be back to where they were just over a year ago.

Mr. President, we have extremely important needs. Obviously, the needs are here at home. I find the underlying premise of the Gramm proposal troublesome. I appreciate his willingness to support the Sasser proposal, but I find it difficult to justify the logic of his presentation when we have seen the major tax cuts that have gone to the wealthiest individuals in our society.

Obviously, we are going to have to deal with our budgetary considerations. But effectively, in supporting the Gramm proposal, you are saying, all right Mr. Average Hard-Working American, you are going to pay your taxes, and do you know something? If we get a little surplus it is going to go to offset those reductions we have had for the wealthiest individuals in America.

I just find that is troublesome. It is not warranted or justified.

I hope, Mr. President, that we will have a serious opportunity to debate this issue. I was impressed by the strong support for the peace dividend from the chairman of the Budget Committee. I identify myself with those remarks. I think we can see a very substantial dividend that should be reflected in the ways that the Senator from Tennessee has outlined in his proposal.

I am hopeful we will get a debate and that we will begin to accommodate American defense policy with the realities of the world today, and give the average working American, hard-working American taxpayer, a really important break.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, how much time do I have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eight minutes and two seconds.

Mr. GRAMM. I yield 6 minutes to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, may I be advised when I have used 4½ minutes of my time?

Mr. President, I am delighted to be an original principal cosponsor of the Gramm amendment, but as I told him, I confess a reservation about it. I just do not want to encourage all of these people who are trotting around talking about a peace dividend, as if the Congress was somehow coming into a windfall of money.

The fact is that we may not spend as much money on defense in the future as we once planned, but that is in no way a dividend. It reminds me, I say to the Senator from Texas, of the PTA meeting down in my little hometown of Monroe when I was a boy. They had a report from the treasurer. She said, "I must advise all of you that we have a $200 deficit. What are we going to do about it?"

One lady raised her hand and she said, "I want 50 percent of it to go to Red Cross; 25 percent to go to the Salvation Army; and we'll use the rest of it to have ourselves a party."

That is what the Congress is doing. We are even, with this bill, adding yet another Federal program that is going to cost the taxpayers dearly. That is exactly the wrong way to go. I am glad to be a cosponsor of Senator GRAMM'S amendment.

If savings are to be realized in the coming years as the result of the events in Europe, the Soviet Union, Central America, et cetera, we have to determine whether we are going to take advantage of those savings to expand economic opportunity and to get the Federal Government off the backs of the people of the United States.

Mr. President, in the area of domestic policy, I think we can identify two problems that are the cause of most other domestic problems: First, the growth of the Federal debt; and second, the breakdown of the traditional American family.

If our country is to remain a great power, we must continue to restrain and reduce the growth of Federal spending until the Federal Government achieves a balanced budget. It is imperative that the Federal debt be reduced.

Let me tell you something. Because of that profligacy of the U.S. Congress—and this is the place where the Federal deficits are created; this is the place that the Federal debt was run up—because of Congress, the tax burden on the American people has become absolutely outrageous.

I have to read some figures to you. Since 1955, the tax burden on most Americans has gone up twice as rapidly as their income, and you can rest assured that they know it.

Senator KASTEN, bless his heart, pointed out recently that on the average, a median-income family of four in the year 1955 paid Federal taxes of 9 percent of the family income.

In 1970, it was 16 percent of the family income. In 1988, it was 24 percent.

That is a trend we must reverse, rather than talking about how we are going to spend this so-called peace dividend. There "ain't no such animal," Mr. President, and we ought to 'fess up and level with the American people and stop talking nonsense.

Mr. President, we must foster public policies that will promote strong, traditional families. As that is done, I'm confident that we can more effectively address other major societal problems, such as illegal drug use and the poor quality of public education.

The Gramm amendment makes it clear that we can meet the needs of the people of this country better by strengthening the family rather than by expanding the government. I commend my friend from Texas.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I believe I have a couple minutes. I want to sum up and be brief. I understand there will be no remarks on the other side, so we can move on the votes.

Mr. President, we have two resolutions before us, and they are fundamentally the same, except in one way. Both talk about balancing the budget, about a commitment to do that without counting the Social Security trust fund. Both talk about cutting taxes. Senator KENNEDY raises concerns about which taxes. I list the taxes: Refundable child care tax credits; repeal of Social Security earnings tax, increase the personal exemption; expand and make permanent the R&D tax credit; a long-term capital gains tax cut; lower marginal rates, and other saving and investment incentives.

Mr. President, where the difference comes is in the provision of the Kennedy-Sasser proposal, which proposes, as the alternative, Government spending money.

Mr. President, on the proposal that I have made, the growth of government would be limited by the growth of the economy. The Government could not grow faster. If the economy grew at 3 percent a year, so would the Government. If it grew by 5 percent, Government would grow by 5 percent.

Under the Sasser proposal, Government would be a beneficiary of the peace dividend, setting the predicate to move out, as we did in the post-Vietnam era, when $380 billion in defense cuts were spent, and the deficit still went up and taxes still went up.

So, Mr. President, I am going to vote for the Sasser amendment, because two out of three is not bad. But if you want a chance to vote, to say the peace dividend ought to go back to American families, there is only one way you can get it: Vote for the Gramm resolution.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I understand Senator KERREY wishes to speak. I yield him 3 minutes.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas is a little difficult for me to understand. I begin my budget decisions trying to justify every single dollar made. Sometimes I vote for things not in Nebraska. Sometimes I vote for things that are in Texas, because I believe, for example, the space station is justified as a national investment. I try to justify each and every dollar that is spent.

The dilemma I have, listening to the proposal and to the comments being made on the other side, is that it seems to me that we are being dishonest, fundamentally, with the American people, because we are not generating a dividend here. We begin with $800 billion that we are going to generate in taxes this year, and then we are going to borrow $200 billion more and give the American people the proceeds.

The fundamental assumption contained in the proposal offered by the Senator from Texas is that the American people have sacrificed a great deal in the eighties. I offer, Mr. President, that we have taken them off the hook. We have let them borrow, and we are telling them borrowing is the same thing as paying for it with tax revenue. It is not. We have created this debt. It made it necessary for us to consider the kind of resolution that is being offered by the Senator from Tennessee that forces us to consider that balancing the budget will in fact accrue benefits to the poor of this country.

The other part of the resolution offered by the Senator from Tennessee is that the American people understand who, in fact, has sacrificed in America in the eighties, who has paid the price in the eighties for the recovery, who has in America been tightening their belts in the eighties, so that we can recover.

It has been the working poor and the middle class, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee addresses those people who have sacrificed the most. The resolution or amendment offered by the Senator from Texas perpetuates a myth that at some point, Mr. President, we in this Congress and in this Senate are going to have to stop agreeing to.

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to ask for the yeas and nays on both these proposals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield back the remainder of my time.

NOT VOTING—2

Matsunaga	Wilson

So the amendment (No. 1274) was agreed to.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I rise today to say a few words about the amendment of my good friend from Texas.

Senator GRAMM, along with his famous partners RUDMAN and HOLLINGS, did this country a great service when he pushed through his plan to help move us toward a balanced budget. I believe his ideas were sound then, and I believe we should give full support to his ongoing efforts to preserve the only spending discipline we have.

However, I am not sure if the amendment he proposes today continues us down that deficit-reduction path.

My reading of the purpose of GRH is that it sets a minimum rate of deficit reduction for Congress to meet. All the penalties are for not meeting the minimum; all the incentives are aimed at moving as quickly as possible to a balanced budget.

Unfortunately, the targets, along with the $10 billion fudge factor, has become a maximum deficit-reduction target. And when we consider accounting gimmicks, and one-time savings, the maximum is lowered to one-half of the original target.

I'm not sure why I should be surprised that Congress lacks the will to do any better than that—but I don't believe we should encourage ourselves by stating that as long as we skin by and meet the deficit-reduction targets that we can then spend any additional savings from the mystic peace dividend.

This is like telling the dieter that if they meet their weekly weight loss goal by Thursday, they can go back to binging until Sunday.

That is simply the wrong way to go.

Instead, we should use any savings from the so-called peace dividend to make the GRH targets into a minimum, rather than a maximum—who would be hurt if we got to a balanced budget sooner rather than later? And who would ever believe that Congress would get something done on time, much less early.

Personally, I believe all savings should go directly into deficit reduction, and then, once we have finally balanced the budget, the funds should go to retiring our massive Federal debt.

I am a firm believer in Government's setting priorities. As Governor of Missouri I faced fiscal difficulties when I came into office. But I made some tough decisions, and we brought the books back into balance—and funded some new needed priorities at the same time.

Our problem here is that while we are very good at crafting new solutions, we are terrible at letting go of programs that don't work or have become outdated. So, while I support many of the goals of my friend Senator GRAMM, I do not think we should approve his amendment here today.

Savings from defense should be savings—not redirected spending. No matter how worthy the new cause, no matter how attractive the tax cut.

Otherwise, the debt—the interest payments on which are now our third largest Federal program—will continue to haunt us and our children for decades rather than years.

NOT VOTING—2

Matsunaga	Wilson

So, the amendment (No. 1270, as modified) was rejected.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HATCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 1275

(Purpose: To improve the bill)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. DOLE], for himself, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. HATCH, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. COHEN, Mr. PRESSLER, Mr. WARNER, and Mr. RUDMAN, proposes an amendment numbered 1275.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 7, line 11, insert "an individual with a disability," before "and".

On page 15, lines 17 and 18, strike out "handicapping conditions" and insert in lieu thereof "disabilities".

On page 20, lines 23 and 24, strike out "handicapping conditions" and insert in lieu thereof "disabilities".

On page 29, lines 24 and 25, strike out "handicapping conditions" and insert in lieu thereof "disabilities".

On page 30, line 21, after "sites," insert "accommodations for individuals with disabilities,".

On page 31, lines 24 and 25, strike out "handicapping conditions" and insert in lieu thereof "disabilities".

On page 34, line 16, strike out "handicapped conditions" and insert in lieu thereof "disabilities".

On page 35, line 4, strike out "handicapped individuals" and insert in lieu thereof "individuals with disabilities".

On page 44, line 2, after "sites," insert "accommodations for individuals with disabilities,".

On page 49, line 11, strike out "handicapping conditions" and insert in lieu thereof "disabilities".

On page 53, line 3, strike out "handicapping conditions" and insert in lieu thereof "disabilities".

On page 53, line 4, strike out "; and" and insert in lieu thereof a semicolon.

On page 53, line 9 after the semicolon insert "and".

On page 53, between lines 9 and 10, insert the following new subparagraph:

"(C) service in programs to assist elderly, disabled, poor, and homeless individuals obtain meaningful employment;"

On page 63, between lines 6 and 7, insert the following new subsection:

(d) ACCOMMODATIONS FOR INDIVIDUALS WITH DISABILITIES.—In accordance with the nondiscrimination provisions of section 174, each training program shall provide reasonable accommodations for individuals with disabilities.

On page 70, line 5, strike out "handicap" and insert in lieu thereof "disability".

On page 79, line 19, strike out "handicap" and insert in lieu thereof "disability".

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I spoke earlier this week on the importance of ensuring that individuals with disabilities be involved in national service programs as volunteers, not just as recipients. The amendments which I am offering have been agreed to on both sides of the aisle and will guarantee that these citizens are given the opportunity to participate fully in any national service initiative.

My proposal will amend this legislation to include "a person with a disability" under the definition of an adult volunteer and add "individuals with disabilities" to the list delineating program participants.

It will also modify that portion of the bill which suggests the types of national service that may be made available under national service demonstration programs, to include programs that assist those who are elderly, disabled, poor, and homeless in obtaining meaningful employment.

People with disabilities are eager and ready to contribute yet still face discrimination and lack of accessibility.

Another amendment under my proposal will make the 3-week training program required by this legislation accessible wherever appropriate for individuals with disabilities.

The responsibility to support people with disabilities begins and ends where it does with everyone else. These amendments will send a signal that people with disabilities, like everyone else, have the knowledge and skills to make a difference in their communities.

Finally, Mr. President, where the bill refers to individuals, or participants, with "handicapping conditions," my proposal would substitute the term "with disabilities" wherever the term "with a handicapping condition" occurs. The usage of the term "with disabilities" is consistent with langauge found in the Rehabilitation Act of 1973 and the Fair Housing Act, as well as disability related legislation pending before Congress, including the Americans With Disabilities Act and the Education of the Handicapped Act. This important change in terminology will bring outdated terminology up-to-date with state-of-the-art policy for people with disabilities.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor Senator DOLE's amendment designed to ensure that people with disabilities will be able to fully participate in the service programs of this bill. When we think of community service, almost automatically we think of the importance of helping the disadvantaged, and this thought usually includes helping people with disabilities.

Too often we forget that people with disabilities have a great many abilities as well. I commend Senator DOLE for putting together this excellent amendment recognizing that people with disabilities often have much to contribute to their fellow citizens and their communities, and we should make sure they get that opportunity.

Mr. President, over the years I have had the pleasure to meet with many of my New Mexico constituents who have disabilities, and have heard much about their struggle to have their capabilities, and willingness to contribute, be accepted and understood by society. I think we would be remiss if we failed to assure that in this bill the disabled are given as much an opportunity as possible to participate in helping others. I urge the Senate to adopt this amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this is a very worthwhile and useful amendment. We had intended that all those with disabilities would be able to participate in this program. This makes it extremely explicit. I think it is an important addition.

I commend the Senator for offering this amendment. I hope the Senate will accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I compliment the distinguished Senator from Kansas. This amendment will assure that disabled persons can work as volunteers as well as the recipients of service.

Mr. President, I support the amendment offered by the distinguished Republican leader. After working so closely with all of our colleagues to develop the Americans With Disabilities Act, I think it is only fair that the suggested changes be incorporated.

Many of those with disabilities have been great examples of courageous service. Despite their limitations, I have been amazed at stories I have heard of those who are not afraid to go beyond what is expected to make their lives worthwhile. Those with disabilities have a great understanding of service.

This amendment acknowledges that understanding and ensures even greater access to service opportunities for all Americans.

So again, thanks to the distinguished Republican leader, we are willing to accept this amendment. We think it is a terrific amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate?

If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1275) was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1276

Mr. GORTON. I thank the distinguished Senator from Colorado.

I have an amendment at the desk for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Washington [Mr. GORTON] proposes an amendment numbered 1276.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At page 46 of the substitute amendment, line 19 after "program," insert the following: "for which a grant has been made to the Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary of Interior, or the Director of ACTION,".

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, this amendment simply corrects an anomaly which was overlooked by the drafters and removes a risk of tort liability for the actions of State employees which was not meant, I understand, to be included in the bill.

I have checked it with both the majority floor manager of the bill and the minority floor manager of the bill, and they agree.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the Gorton amendment clarifies the extent to which the Federal Tort Claims Act is applicable to Conservation Corps participants under the act. We think that is a useful clarification.

I urge that the Senate accept the amendment.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I agree with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts and the distinguished Senator from Washington. He is doing a very good service here, and we accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1276) was agreed to.

Mr. GORTON. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. HATCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The moton to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1277

(Purpose: To provide that any program receiving grants provided under the National and Community Service Act of 1990 is subject to Drug-Free Workplace Requirements for Federal Grant Recipients)

Mr. HATCH. Will the distinguished Senator from Colorado yield to me to send an amendment to the desk?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah, [Mr. HATCH].

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH], for Mr. D'AMATO, proposes an amendment numbered 1277.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

(Purpose: To provide that any program receiving grants provided under the National and Community Service Act of 1990 is subject to Drug-Free Workplace Requirements for Federal Grant Recipients)

at the appropriate place in the bill insert the following: "All programs receiving grants provided under this Act shall be subject to the Drug-Free Workplace Requirements for Federal Grant Recipients under section 5153 through 5158 of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 (41 U.S.C. 702-707)."

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have sent this amendment to the desk on behalf of my colleague from New York [Mr. D'AMATO]. This amendment clarifies that all programs receiving funds under the act will be subject to the drug-free workplace requirement for Federal grant recipients.

I understand this amendment has been cleared on both sides and I want to thank Senator D'AMATO for clarifying this issue.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, my amendment makes it clear that all programs receiving grants provided under the National Community Service Act of 1990 will be subject to the drug-free workplace requirements for Federal grant recipients that we included in the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988.

The drug-free workplace requirements in the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 are intended to prohibit the awarding of a Federal grant to any organization that does not take specific steps to provide a drug-free workplace. It provides for suspension or termination of any grantee found to be in violation.

The drug-free workplace requirements of the Act of 1988 specifically provide that grant recipients must insure that they will provide a drug free workplace by: notifying all employees that the illegal manufacture, distribution, dispensation, possession, and use of a controlled substance is prohibited; and establishing a drug-free awareness program designed to inform employees about the perils of drug-abuse in the workplace, counselling and educational programs designed to address this problem, and the penalties and sanctions which may be imposed upon violators.

By applying these requirements to grants awarded under the National and Community Service Act of 1990 this amendment also requires that grantees make a good-faith and thorough effort to maintain a drug-free workplace, and cooperate with granting agencies to insure that all policies designed to promote drug prevention in the workplace are followed.

This amendment also makes it clear that Federal agencies may suspend payments or terminate grants for those recipients who do not comply with the act.

Making any program receiving grants provided under the National Community Service Act of 1990 subject to the Drug-Free Workplace requirements will certainly strengthen the act, and, because of the additional accountability imposed, it should enhance our present drug strategy initiatives aimed at eliminating drugs from the workplace.

Mr. HATCH. I urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I support the amendment and urge the Senate to accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1277) was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 1278

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield for just one more amendment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Sure. Yes, of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH].

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk to modify language under title III of the substitute. This amendment has been cleared. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Utah [Mr. HATCH], proposes an amendment numbered 1278.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At page 111, of the substitute offered by Senator Kennedy, strike all after line 12 through and including line 15, page 115, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 303. AUTHORITY.

(a) The President is authorized to designate a private, nonprofit organization (hereafter referred to as the Foundation) to receive funds pursuant to section 401(a)(7), upon his determination that such organization is capable of carrying out the undertaking described in section 302. Sec. 305. ELIGIBILITY OF THE FOUNDATION FOR GRANTS.

(a) Grants may be made to the Foundation pursuant to this Act only if the Foundation agrees to comply with the require-

(h) The accounts of the Foundation shall be audited annually in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards by independent certified public accountants or independent licensed public accountants certified or licensed by a regulatory authority of a State or other political subdivision of the United States. The report of each such independent audit shall be included in the annual report required by subsection (l) of this section

(i) So long as the Foundation is receiving grants pursuant to this Act, the accounts of the Foundation may be audited at any time by any agency designated by the President. The Foundation shall keep such records as will facilitate effective audits.

(j) So long as it is receiving grants pursuant to this Act, the Foundation shall be subject to appropriate oversight procedures of the Congress.

(k) The Foundation shall ensure—

(1) that any recipient of financial assistance provided by the Foundation from funds granted pursuant to this Act keeps separate accounts with respect to such assistance and such records as may be reasonably necessary to disclose fully (i) the amount and the disposition by such recipient of the assistance received from the Foundation, (ii) the total cost of the project or undertaking in connection with which such assistance is given or used, (iii) the amount and nature of that portion of the cost of the project or undertaking supplied by other sources, and (iv) such other records as will facilitate effective audits; and

This report shall be submitted not later than three months after the conclusion of any fiscal year in which the Foundation receives grants pursuant to this Act.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the amendment has been agreed to, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we have looked at the legislative language surrounding the Points of Light Initiative Foundation that was proposed by the White House. These are good changes that add important provisions with respect to lobbying, conflict of interest, and accountability, and I am pleased to urge the Senate accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on amendment 1278? If not, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1278) was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. I thank my colleague from Colorado.

AMENDMENT NO. 1279

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, on behalf of a number of colleagues, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG], for himself, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. COATS, Mr. GORTON, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. LOTT, Mr. MCCAIN, and Mr. MCCLURE, proposes an amendment numbered 1279.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, ordinarily at this point I would suggest that we dispense with reading of the amendment, but I think it would be appropriate to read it. It is only about 4 or 5 lines long, and it well expresses the intent and purpose of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

SEC. . Section 1-2503 of the District of Columbia Code (1981 edition) is amended by redesignating subsection (c) as subsection (d) and inserting after subsection (b) the following new subsection:

"(c) Nothing in this chapter shall be construed to bar any organization or entity from denying, restricting, abridging, or conditioning the participation of any adult homosexual person or adult bisexual person in any program or activity that—

(1) educates, coaches, or trains any minor, or

(2) holds out the adult as a role model, mentor, or companion to any minor.".

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, when I learned a few months ago that the District of Columbia had in effect forced the Big Brothers of America organization to admit homosexuals into their counseling program, I must say I was dumfounded. In fact, my first reaction was to disbelieve, in fact, that it was happening.

There were some published articles to that effect at the time, and I asked my staff to look into it. I discovered that this relevant provision of the D.C. Human Rights Act was exactly that effect, and that the D.C. goverment, in fact, is vigorously enforcing it.

I think my colleagues know that the purpose of the Big Brothers of America is to match adult volunteers with boys who need role models. Big Brothers of the National Capital Area has had a policy of rejecting any applicant who wishes to be a Big Brother if the applicant is homosexual.

Last fall, under pressure from the D.C. department that enforces the Human Rights Act, Big Brothers of the National Capital Area changed its policy and began accepting homosexuals.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that there be inserted in the RECORD at this point a brief news item taken from the Washington Post of October 24, 1989, which discusses this issue.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Oct. 24, 1989]

BIG BROTHERS SHIFT RULES

The Big Brothers of the National Capital Area has altered a policy under which it rejected the applications of homosexuals who volunteered to serve as role models for youngsters, officials of the organization said.

Under a vote taken last week by the private organization, the determination for matching a youngster with a volunteer is to be left to the youngster's mother, Big Brothers officials said.

In August, the D.C. Office of Human Rights decided to investigate a complaint filed by a Greenbelt man who alleged that the Big Brothers excluded him because he is homosexual.

The man alleged that the group violated a D.C. law prohibiting discrimination against homosexuals by employers and public accommodations.

A Human Rights Office spokeswoman said in August that the agency had categorized Big Brothers as a "place of public accommodation."

United Press International quoted an official of the Gay and Lesbian Activist Alliance of Washington as expressing satisfaction yesterday that Big Brothers "will finally allow gay men to contribute to the community as they would anyone else."

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, my amendment simply will allow Big Brothers and other similar organizations in the District of Columbia to set their own policy without coercion from the City Council with respect to the participation of adult homosexuals or bisexual persons in such programs or activities.

Mr. President, in a sense, it was tempting for me and for my cosponsors to simply forbid such participation, but to do so would in effect make the mirror-image mistake of judgment and public policy that the D.C. City Council is making. They have a coercive policy which says if you are going to have a volunteer organization that works with young people, you have to admit and permit homosexuals to participate and to be role models.

We are not saying that they may not have such persons, though it would be my earnest hope that homosexual persons would not be placed in such capacities or roles where impressionable young people would see them as role models.

We are just simply saying that this particular provision of the District of Columbia Code will not require or could coerce or force Big Brothers in similar organizations to do so.

We just would be absolutely clear about that. If my amendment is adopted Big Brothers could keep its current policy, revert to its former policy, or adopt some other policy. It leaves the option to the volunteer organizations affected.

Mr. President, let me also make it clear that the amendment is not as broad or sweeping as some might desire in that it deals only with adults, only with those adults who work with minors, and only with adults who are in the District of Columbia. We are not trying to set out to chart new policy for some broad-gauged agenda nationwide. We are only dealing with a volunteer organization situation that is not speculative, that has arisen, that is a present problem in the District of Columbia where Congress has the legislative jurisdiction.

If some State government is foolish enough to adopt a similar policy, that is up to the voters of that State. If some city council in Colorado or Utah or Massachusetts or somebody someplace decides to do it, that is up to them. Our responsibility is over the District of Columbia.

It fits on this bill because this is a bill about voluntarism. But I have deliberately tried to draft an amendment which is narrow in its scope and application, which is implemented to a clearly defined specific abuse, and is not hypothetical or speculative in nature.

Mr. President, with that word of explanation, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not accept the amendment of the Senator from Colorado. We have been over this issue over the period of the last 2 years. There has been no request to us from the District or from any of the groups in the District. Each State writes its own laws in terms of tax exemptions and human rights. So does the District of Columbia.

This amendment says we will only apply this to the District of Columbia, and we will let the rest of the States do whatever they want. If it is sauce for the goose, it ought to be sauce for the gander. If the Senate wants to preempt all State laws, that is one thing. But this is only targeted to one jurisdiction. That is the District of Columbia.

We have had no request from any of the voluntary organizations indicating that this is a problem.

So I think it is particularly intrusive. Therefore, I move to table the amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am glad to yield. I hold the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the motion withdrawn?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

I am glad to yield.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, who is the manager on behalf of the Democrats, makes a couple of points that deserve to be answered. He points out there had been no request for legislation from the D.C. government. Of course, that is true because of the very abuses we are trying to correct are not only agreed to but, in fact, are caused by and are vigorously insisted upon by the D.C. city government. What we are doing is seeking to amend the human rights code of the District of Columbia.

The Senator from Massachusetts points out that this is a matter that we have considered before in this Chamber. That is correct. On a previous occasion, in fact on a couple, I have asked the Senate, with a narrowly drawn amendment, to preclude the District of Columbia from forcing religious institutions to grant to homosexual organizations on colleges campuses, on the campuses of religious institutions within the District of Columbia, or to impose requirements that they be given recognition or material support. In fact, at my request and on my motion, the Senate has done so. It has been enacted. It is the law of the District of Columbia.

Why, if that has been done, do we need this? The reason is when I offered the amendment previously, I only addressed the then existing abuse. I did not seek to repeal the entire D.C. statute, though, if I were a member of the D.C. City Council, that is exactly what I would seek to do. But, instead, I simply aimed at what was on the table without speculating with other problems that might subsequently arise.

This is a problem which has subsequently arisen. In other words, I did not know at the time—in fact, I cannot imagine that any Senator would have foreseen, that the District of Columbia would enact an ordinance, and then vigorously prosecute the ordinance, the effect of which is to force a volunteer organization, which is seeking to do a worthy and important work to help young boys who need role models, to force upon them against their will to admit into the capacity of counselor and role model homosexual persons.

Again, I have not offered to make this a broad-gauged, sweeping amendment that solves a lot of problems that have not arisen. I am only addressing the problem that we know about. It is real. It is not hypothetical. It is a great injustice. It is abhorrent. It seems to me that there should be little dispute about the need to amend this section of the D.C. Code.

Finally, let me address the point that somehow the Senator thinks that it is unfair to do this only for the District of Columbia; that we are letting other States make their own arrangements. I just want to point out that while some think of the District of Columbia as a State, I do not think that. Maybe it will be someday. But in the meantime, it is something other than a State, and we treat it legislatively quite differently than we treat the respective States which retain at least, in some respects, a degree of sovereignty. Under the Home Rule Act, as well as under the Constitution, Congress is the legislative body for the District of Columbia in much the same way that the General Assembly of Colorado is the legislative body for my State.

So we have a legislative jurisdiction. We know what the problem is. We have a clear responsibility to act on it. If the Senator persists in his intention to table my amendment, I hope we will vote down the tabling motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as I mentioned before, this is limited just to the District of Columbia. We have taken action relevant to this a little over a year ago. The issue that was raised was at Georgetown University on a particular group that was on the campus. Georgetown University explicitly has indicated that it does not wish to have this kind of legislative interference, and the issue has been resolved satisfactorily, as I understand it, at the university, and it has explicitly requested that there not be this kind of Federal intrusion. Therefore, I move to table the amendment.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the Senator yield for a question? I think he misstates the situation.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yielded earlier, and this amendment now just came on 10 minutes ago. We have been on the floor now for 3 days, and I move to table.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, will my colleague care to withhold that motion?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield for a question.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I have two or three questions I want to raise. I believe the Senator actually does not understand the intention of the amendment, because it has nothing to do with Georgetown. That issue is settled. A statute has been enacted on it. This has nothing to do with any college or university.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We have a motion to table, which is not debatable.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am going to persist in the motion, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question then is on the motion.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I believe my colleague from Massachusetts has graciously consented to withhold his motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a motion to table.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I believe it is the Senator's intention to withhold or withdraw that motion.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I withhold that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the motion is withdrawn. The Senator from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, my only desire is to clarify an unintentional misunderstanding. The Senator mentioned that this had not been requested by Georgetown or by any university. That is correct. This has nothing to do with the Georgetown case. That has been settled.

Congress has enacted a statute which, in effect, preempts a similar section of the D.C. Human Rights Code, because the D.C. city government has imposed really what, in the opinion of an overwhelming majority of Members of this Chamber, was an intolerable and unfair burden on the universities.

This has nothing to do with that. This addresses a similar abuse of a volunteer organization, the Big Brothers of the National Capital Area. So anyone who thinks we did the right thing in the case of the so-called Georgetown amendment, or what is technically known as the religious liberty amendment, I think would be disposed to vote for this. I did not want to leave, unintentionally, confusion that somehow we were solving a problem we have already dealt with. This is not the same problem, but it is similar.

The District of Columbia is trying to force Big Brothers and other similar organizations to admit homosexuals into their program as counselors and role models for the youngsters that they work with. I think that is intolerable. My amendment does not say they may not have such persons in their organization. It says it is up to them.

To sum up, I leave it at this: If this amendment passes and is enacted, Big Brothers and similar organizations can keep the policy they have, and they can go back to the policy they had formerly, or they can have some other kind of policy.

My amendment does not require them to do anything. What it does is prevent the D.C. City Council and the D.C. department that enforces this statue from imposing on them in this way, imposing what I believe to be a very unfair requirement.

Mr. President, I again thank my colleague from Massachusetts for his courtesy. I think we are now ready to take up his motion to table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, oftentimes the Senate seems unable or unwilling to look at what it has already done that is pretty good and sets off on a new Quixotian conquest, to try to reinvent the wheel. Mr. President, I am speaking about the Congressional Award, much of the style of which has been plagiarized by the Senate Labor and Human Relations Committee, but none of the good of which has been.

I will give a little history to the Senate. The Congressional Award, was signed into law by President Carter in 1979. We have had a hard time, Mr. President, getting Congress to recognize the good that it did when it established that program. But it provides for 3 medals for young people in America, competing against themselves. So we do not need the handicap amendment, we do not need the award—in this instance only one per congressional district. These are young people who in America go out and earn their own awards in three areas: physical self improvement, in community service—voluntarism, if you will—and in exploration.

Mr. President, the young people of America where these programs exist have given three-quarters of a million hours and this committee did not even pause to recognize it. Three-quarters of a million hours to all kinds of things, like Meals on Wheels, to community ambulance services, to go sit with an elderly couple who were injured on a farm.

This committee takes all of the structure and creates a new award program but only one person per district.

We know, Mr. President, that turns into elitism and it becomes political. That is precisely what it is going to do. Whereas the Congressional Award is precisely the opposite. It encourages the young people of America and they have responded; where there have been Members of Congress interested enough to set up such a program in their district, they have responded incredibly.

We had the handicap amendment just a little while ago. Mr. President, one of the first recipients of the gold medal was a youth who had been perennially handicapped, who lived in a wheelchair, and set for himself the task of walking the length of a football field for his physical self-improvement. He achieved that. It would be like any of these flaccid old Senators running seven marathons in an afternoon. This young fellow did that.

We have this program. I ask the chairman of the committee or the Republican manager of the bill, why was the Congressional Award not considered when creating this voluntarism bill?

Mr. KENNEDY. I apologize to the Senator. I was just gathering, from the end of his remarks; he asked why did we not consider the Congressional Award?

Mr. WALLOP. Why did my colleague consider a new award, for one person in a district, which competes with the Congressional Award which has already been set up which encourages the young people of America to do just precisely that kind of thing? But in that instance they have people in their districts who work with them, volunteer to take care of these incredible achievements that they have. Instead, my colleagues set up another award?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am delighted to respond. The Senator has identified an issue which we believe has some merit. It is basically ancillary to the other provisions, which we hope will encourage voluntarism. We know there are those who do not believe there should be a stipend given, or that there ought to be an opportunity to work for benefits, such as in education. We know there are those who would like to have only the very wealthiest individuals be able to volunteer. But we have recognized that voluntarism goes all the way through the economy and goes to those with low incomes and middle incomes as well as higher incomes. So we have structured this with a variety of different programs.

The purpose of the variety of different programs is to do an evaluation, after 2 years, to look at the Conservation Corps, to look at the Serve America Program, to look at what has been done in the area of education in five or six different kinds of proposals. And one of them permits the President of the United States to give an award in a congressional district for outstanding service.

We do not say that is the answer. That is just an add-on. This whole provision is a variety of different recommendations.

We have suggestions from Members, including Members from my colleague's own side. This particular proposal was strongly advocated by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPECTER].

It is not obligatory. If the President does not want to provide them, he does not have to. There is no obligation.

So I have difficulty, Mr. President, wondering why at this hour of the night the Senator is so excited about this particular provision. I think it is probably a generally useful one. If, over a period of time the President makes a decision to grant an award, and finds that individual in that particular district, and we see that that type of support and encouragement does increase the numbers of volunteers in different parts of the country—so be it. If he does not, so be it.

We have a variety of different kinds of awards, Mr. President. We are now also considering honoring teachers, scientists. We have different corporations that do it. I know there are some who think perhaps there are too many. We do think this, at least, is a useful idea.

There is no obligation. If the President does not desire to use those particular provisions, there are no requirements.

So I hear what the Senator is saying, but I cannot quite reach the same conclusion as the Senator has.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I feared the response that I would get from the Senator would be precisely the one I got.

The committee does not know about the Congressional Award. In fact, the committee does not understand what it, this Congress, has already done, and the good it has already created in America.

First of all, let me say these volunteers are genuine volunteers. And they are not wealthy children. It insults the program to suggest that only the wealthy have participated in the Congressional Awards. In fact, quite the contrary, most of the children who have won these awards have come from inner-city schools. Most of them have.

Just so we can get into the RECORD what we have already, we have the Congressional Award, which is an earned honor, that any young person in America can earn. He does not have to be cited by the President. He does not have to have a political connection., He has to have an award program, period.

It goes to youth between the ages of 14 and 23, a bronze medal, a silver medal, or a gold medal, based on their achievements, and each level of award is based on attaining a set number of activities in each of three areas: Volunteer public service, not paid volunteer but voluntary; personal development; physical fitness. Each of these young people has an adult American who is willing to volunteer and commit his time to oversee that program while the award is earned.

Anyone who has read the report for the National Community Service Act will realize that the existing Congressional Award Program is similar to the Award for Service Program proposed by section 417 of the act.

The act just does, in effect, duplicate an existing volunteer award program, but for the fact that only one in a congressional district can earn it. And he has to be discovered by the President of the United States.

The National Service Act actually pays the volunteers for their services. It does not recognize that young people in America of every class, are, today, volunteering their services.

This is a Nation of good and decent people, and the committee somehow or another thinks it has to pay people to be good and decent. It does not recognize what exists now today and is working in America.

We went through the same exercise of the public works employment in the late 1970's. Even President Carter eventually rejected the program as wasteful. It is an ill-disguised attempt to revise that program.

In my opinion, Mr. President, the Senate should delete section 417, the awards program, since it duplicates ours, competes with ours, and diminishes the award the Congress has already created.

This Senate and the House of Representatives paid short shrift to the award, and if they would pay half as much attention as this committee has to creating a duplicate system, that award would be thriving in every congressional district in America today.

Mr. President, I yield the floor, expressing my profound discouragement. It does not seem to care to advocate its continued use and expansion.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALLOP. I will be happy to.

Mr. HATCH. I appreciate what the Senator is saying, and it is important. I think the Congressional Awards are very important.

This bill gives permission to the President, if he wants, to grant awards. It just is another way of providing recognition for those who provide exemplary meritorious service.

Mr. WALLOP. Is he aware that the only award given in the name of Congress is the Congressional Award, given by the Congress of the United States?

Mr. HATCH. Is the President aware?

Mr. WALLOP. It is the Congressional Award. This is our program. It is the only award that bears the name of Congress. And the committee chose to ignore it, not even reference it in their report.

Mr. HATCH. I am aware of that, and I think the fact this bill ignores it does not mean we do not have Senators, individual Senators, who recognize how valid the system of Congressional Awards really is.

I think the Senator has raised a valid point, but we already knew about the Congressional Award. What we are doing here is just permitting the President, if he wants to, to issue additional awards.

Mr. WALLOP. Please forgive me. I understand what is being done here, and I understand it is permissive and not mandatory.

But here is a committee setting about to examine voluntarism in America, ignoring the achievements of what Congress has already done, and not even giving encouragement that that be part of the program of voluntarism.

Mr. HATCH. I take the Senator's criticism seriously, and I have to say I think he points out a defect in the bill. I am not opposed to remedying that defect if he wants to, but I personally think everybody here recognizes Congressional Awards are important. We accept them. We want them to have the prestige that they do have.

I do not know that adding them to this bill, when they are already in existence, does anything to add more to their prestige.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I say to the Senator that everybody here does not recognize it, including this committee. That is the level of frustration that this Senator has, who was one of the founders of that award, who sat on the board of it and has been trying to gain the attention of the Senate now for over a decade, and people ignore it.

This is the best example we have of its being ignored, an incredible program that exists in some 24 of our States now is just overlooked.

I guess my plea here on the floor tonight is not to continue this argument, but to tell us that we have something that is attracting enormously good qualities out of the young people of America, and it is the only award that Congress gives in its own name.

I plead with the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Massachusetts that they recognize and try and help support the award that we already have. Go ahead with your voluntary bill, go ahead with the paid volunteers, but for heaven's sake, recognize that young people from every level and walk of life, whole and lame and halt, have been a part of this award, have achieved enormously inspiring things, and we choose here tonight to ignore it. We cannot even get Senators to come to the award ceremonies that we have in this Capitol from time to time.

I am just suggesting that what Congress has already done is really good, and what Congress is doing now, is ignoring what good it has already created with the Congressional Award Program.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEFLIN). The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I want to express my appreciation to the managers of the bill for the courtesy to set this time aside for me to make brief remarks on another subject.

Before doing so, I would like to compliment the managers of the bill for the excellent work they have been doing on the floor and the authors of this legislation for bringing it forward for our consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. GORE pertaining to the submission of Senate Concurrent Resolution 97 are located in today's RECORD under "Submission of Concurrent and Senate Resolutions.")

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KOHL). The Clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I gather we are sort of at ease while we work out things behind the scenes, so perhaps this is a good moment for my annual speech about colloquys and committee reports.

From time to time, I have noted that there are some uninformed souls who take what appears in the reports of committees of the Senate, and what appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as colloquys and statements to be valid statements of legislative intent. If there should be anybody who is inclined to do so, I would like to point out a couple of things, particularly if there should be a judge some place in a court who might read a committee report or read a colloquy that is inserted in the RECORD and say, "So that is what Congress intended," and thereby decide some pending lawsuit in accordance with that understanding.

I would just like to put such judges and other persons on notice. First, Senators do not write committee reports. For the most part, Senators do not read committee reports. So, obviously, they cannot actually represent any valid legislative intent.

In fact, I just happened to pick up a committee report that was on this desk. I would judge that there probably is not even one Senator who has read as much as half of the 709 pages of this committee report. I would judge there is not any Senator who has read all of it. Probably it would be safe to say something over 90 Members of Senate have not read any of it.

I do not say this to criticize, because it nonetheless is a document that is useful as a point of reference for certain purposes, but let me just say to a judge or others who think this is legislative intent, it is not.

The reason why this is important is because sometimes I know courts are inclined to so interpret committee reports and colloquys and so on. I made a statement similar to this a few years ago and not too long afterward a judge in Virginia cited my comments in pointing out why he had ignored some committee report, and I am glad he did. He did the right thing. Legislation speaks for itself. An attempt to legislate by committee report is not only a bad practice, but, in fact, it does not represent valid legislative intent.

Now, about colloquys. On yesterday, I entered into a colloquy with one of my colleagues, and I was dismayed to note that right after that colloquy there appeared in the RECORD a statement which he made, of which I was not aware, and would not have been had not a sharp-eyed member of my staff spotted his statement, which may be interpreted by some as in some way undoing the colloquy.

I just wanted to say for the RECORD—and I want to say it publicly so that nobody gets sandbagged—I am going to put another statement in the RECORD which restates what I thought the colloquy was all about. The bottom line is colloquys are hot air and should be ignored by thoughtful people.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the evidence is clear: When Americans are asked to serve others and are given the opportunity, they come forward eagerly. What is also clear is that we have not been sending a strong message from the Federal level about the importance of serving. And we are not giving the kinds of assistance that make it possible for Americans of all ages and walks of life to give such service. The National and Community Service Act of 1990 sends a strong message and moves us in the direction of giving those opportunities.

I commend our Labor and Human Resources chairman, Senator KENNEDY, for his efforts on this legislation. I am grateful to him and to Senator HATCH for agreeing to include in this substitute bill a number of amendments I recommended. These amendments give greater attention to basic skills needs and illiteracy among both the volunteers and program recipients, and provide testing and services to those who may have learning disabilities. In addition, the amendments include libraries in the definition of an education institution, making it clear that libraries are eligible for funding under the School and Community-based Service Partnership Program.

Mr. President, as I read the debate from Tuesday evening I noted some misunderstanding in regard to the benefits available to those who serve in what I believe is an excellent model for national service, the VISTA program. I'd like to make it clear to my colleagues that VISTA volunteers, who must serve at least 1 year and be on call 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, currently receive a stipend at the end of their year of service of only $75 a month. That is only a $900 reward for their 1 year of service. That figure will go up to $90 a month next year and to $95 a month in the following year. At the maximum, in 1992, it will result in a stipend of only $1,140 per year. This is in comparison to the $5,000 in housing or education vouchers for a year of service under the National Service Demonstration Program under this bill.

VISTA is the domestic equivalent of the Peace Corps, a program that has provided great service to hundreds of thousands around the world while providing an invaluable service to the United States. These volunteers have postservice benefits a little more generous than VISTA's: $2,400 a year for up to 2 years of service—still not half of the amount that will be available to the national service volunteers.

One of the more valuable parts of this bill is our colleague Senator BUMPERS' provision to expand loan forgiveness and to make sure that applicants for Stafford and Perkins student loans are informed of the loan forgiveness available if they serve as a VISTA or Peace Corps volunteer or in an equivalent full-time volunteer capacity. This loan forgiveness in some respects compensates for the discrepancy in the postservice rewards for the national service volunteer and the VISTA volunteer. It is my understanding that the intent of the legislation is that this loan forgiveness is not an additional benefit available to national service volunteers under S. 1430.

But I would like to make sure that VISTA volunteers who may be working side by side with national service volunteers in the same antipoverty project will not feel they are less valued by those of us who design these programs. When each VISTA literacy corps volunteer recruits and trains from 100 to 200 community volunteers in literacy each year, as they are doing in Chicago and throughout Illinois today, we should be doing all we can to let them know their magnificent efforts are recognized and appreciated. And we should be encouraging more people to sign on as VISTA's. VISTA has a 25-year record of service that few programs can match.

And I also want to make sure that Peace Corps volunteers are not denigrated by being considered less valuable to their country than those who serve in communities here at home.

Because it is late in this process to be coming up with an amendment to provide equity for VISTA and Peace Corps volunteers, I have asked our chairman for an assurance that we will work with the House to address this issue in the final bill that comes out of conference. I believe the level of national service benefits could and should be made an option for these volunteers—not on top of their existing benefits or the new loan forgiveness benefits, but as an alternative option for these volunteers who live and work among the poorest of the poor in this country and countries around the world, and who generally have more stringent service requirements than will be required of national service volunteers.

In another area, Mr. President, just recently the Senate demonstrated strong concern for the problem of illiteracy in this country by voting 99 to 0 to pass the National Literacy Act. I appreciate my colleagues' support on that legislation and want to point out that we should not overlook the fact that this bill, S. 1430, can serve as a complement to the National Literacy Act. There is no question that as we expand and develop programs to combat illiteracy, our need for committed volunteers in a variety of areas will increase.

This legislation offers an opportunity to reach and train volunteers to serve in literacy programs. In addition, the attention to youth who are educationally disadvantaged, particularly in the American Conservation and Youth Corps, will help us reach many young people who may soon be among the millions of adult illiterate in this country if we don't give them the help they need now.

Since my early days in Congress, I have been in favor of enacting some type of national service. Back in 1979, as chairman of the House Subcommittee on Select Education, I chaired a hearing in which we looked at a variety of national service models and heard testimony on the need for such programs. My longtime friend, Harris Wofford, then cochair of the Committee for the Study of National Service, stated that the idea of voluntary national service was an "invitation to the imagination of both the public and private sectors." A decade later, at a hearing I chaired in Philadelphia last year, Harris Wofford, as Pennsylvania's secretary of labor, was arguing the same issue while testifying on S. 543, a bill I've introduced to amend the Job Training Partnership Act and establish a Fair Chance Youth Opportunities Program. He pleaded with us once again to act on a national level to help states meet these urgent needs.

S. 1430 responds by giving young people an opportunity to learn the significance of service to others while addressing important national needs. I might add that when we take up S. 543 here in the Senate, will have another chance to reach the 600,000 to 700,000 young people who drop out each year and are left behind in our society—as well as those millions of adults who continue to be out of work and out of hope. To make a meaningful impact on a problem of such magnitude, and of such importance to the economic and social well-being of the Nation, we clearly need to act through a variety of approaches that complement and reinforce each other. These legislative initiatives working together can give real hope and opportunity to millions.

Mr. President, I am pleased that the contributions and importance of VISTA and the Older American Volunteer Programs are not ignored in the enactment of this national service legislation. Because we just recently reauthorized the Domestic Volunteer Service Act and increased the funding for VISTA and the Older American Volunteer Programs, this bill does not include them. But it would be a significant oversight if they wre not goven recognition in the consideration of national service and in the findings of this bill. There are no better models for national and community service that exist under the Domestic Volunteer Service Act, and I'm pleased that much of the National and Community Service Act is drawn from the concepts in these long effective programs. I trust that the attention we are giving to new service opportunities will increase our commitment to expanding these older ones as well. And I hope we will not fail to provide fairness and equity in the benefits for these volunteers.

Once again, I'm pleased we are acting to use our human resources more wisely. We will be enriching our Nation and enriching each one of the volunteers who participates in these programs. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I rise to express my support for S. 1430, the National and Community Service Act.

Let me begin by congratulating my colleagues who have promoted the concept of national service. Senator KENNEDY, Senator NUNN, Senator MIKULSKI, Senator ROBB, Senator DODD, Senator GRAHAM, and Senator BUMPERS have each made significant contributions to this legislation and have worked together to bring forward a comprehensive and effective national service proposal.

My gratitude and appreciation also go to Majority Leader MITCHELL, whose leadership made public service a priority by placing it on the Democratic agenda last March.

I wholeheartedly support the National and Community Service Act, which recognizes the need to revive the spirit of voluntarism in America. Our modern society places many personal demands on every American's time and energy, and, as a result, civic responsibility has simply become a low priority for too many Americans. A culture of apathy has begun to emerge in our Nation as Americans too often forget the important role they have to play in serving their communities and their country.

Congress must help reverse this societal trend that dissociates citizens from involvement in civic life. Most importantly, adults must teach young Americans about the important responsibilities that accompany democracy's freedoms and rights. Teachers and students alike admit that today's generation of young adults has a diminished willingness to become involved in activities outside the sphere of their own personal lives. Young adults, however, also express a definite interest in serving in their communities through a planned volunteer program.

The National and Community Service Act will establish an organized volunteer program that will tap into the resources and talents of all Americans. School-based and community agencies will work together to create and expand service opportunities for students, and a full-time youth corps will provide opportunities for young adults to earn postservice education and training benefits. For adults, this legislation would provide full- and part-time service opportunities in a wide range of areas, with full-time participants able to earn either education benefits, first-home benefits, or both.

In my home State of South Dakota, this legislation will open up a wide variety of service opportunities for people of all ages. South Dakotans may become involved in efforts to promote and preserve our precious but limited forest, agricultural, recreational, and wildlife areas, as well as our cultural and historical resources. Existing community programs that serve the elderly and shut-in will also be given a boost by this legislation, and new programs may be developed to target the specific needs of the elderly who live in rural areas. From social service programs like tutoring and literacy training to environmental protection efforts, I am confident that South Dakotans will join in a renewed national commitment to community service.

As the United States enters a new decade, the National and Community Service Act will help young and old alike work together to help themselves by helping others. Active volunteers will help rebuild America's infrastructure as they earn basic job skills and a sense of civic pride. In the words of President Lyndon Johnson, who created the Volunteers in Service to America Program, these volunteers will gain that "ultimate reward which comes to those who serve their fellow man."

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am very thankful to my colleagues who have worked so hard to craft national and community service legislation. This bill is long overdue.

The National and Community Service Act provides many opportunities for Americans of all ages to volunteer in their communities. It will generate 1 billion hours of community service over the next 5 years by building on existing programs, encouraging schools to involve students in volunteer service, and offering incentives to those who wish to make a substantial full- or part-time commitment to civilian service.

I am glad this bill has a special focus on youth. Too often on this floor we debate the amount of money to spend on law enforcement, or how tough we should make laws to deter young people from drugs and crime.

Not often enough do we spend our time passing laws which give children something to which they can say "yes."

I have been a supporter of community service for a long time, and I am pleased to be a cosponsor of this bill. This is a compromise measure that incorporates aspects of 14 Senate bills. It has the support of over 65 national organizations.

So many volunteer efforts on the local level deserve our support. In my own State of Vermont, hundreds of volunteer programs involving youth, seniors, and adults of all ages provide needed services in our towns and rural areas.

There is one volunteer program in Vermont of which I am especially proud.

It is at St. Michael's College in Winooski, VT—my alma mater. Two years ago the school recognized the value of getting its students out into the community. They established a program called MOVE, or Mobilization of Volunteer Efforts. This program has been successful beyond the hopes of its creators. During the 1988-89 academic year alone, more than 400 students—that is about 25 percent of the student body—performed over 20,000 hours of community service.

MOVE has successfully channeled the talents, creativity and energy of St. Michael's students into innovative and effective service programs that make a difference in the community.

MOVE is addressing unserved needs in its local community. The "Hunger Garden," for example, was started in the summer of 1988 by Rev. Thomas Hoar. St. Michael's gave two plots of land for the garden, where squash, tomatoes, potatoes, string beans, carrots, and other vegetables are planted. After student volunteers harvested the vegetables, all the food was shipped to the Chittenden County Emergency Food Shelf which services the hungry in this Vermont county.

Students are becoming more aware of the needs of persons with disabilities. After spending "Physical Awareness Day" in wheelchairs, students learned about the barriers some of their students encounter. The day was effective in spreading awareness of the physically challenged and their needs. A student named Larry, who has cerebral palsy, has benefited from this awareness. Many students volunteer to help Larry get to classes and live in student housing.

On a warm September afternoon in the fall, St. Michael's campus was filled with colorful balloons, clowns and smiling faces. The event was the First Annual Kids' Day. With about 150 area children, the day's activities included of art tables, games, a puppet show, a magician, a story teller, and refreshments. It was a time for the children to enjoy themselves and chance for St. Michael's students to become familiar with volunteering.

Many students spend their spring breaks volunteering in other areas of the county. For several years, the MOVE Program has sponsored week-long programs that offer an alternative to more traditional spring break activities. St. Michael's students have volunteered at Covenant House, a home for runaway teenagers, and have worked with social service organizations in Appalachia.

I am proud to say that the MOVE Program at St. Michael's College has been named by President Bush as the "Thirty-fourth Point of Light." This national recognition is well-deserved.

But it is not enough that we support efforts like the MOVE Program with a title, however prestigious. We must provide them with the financial and organizational support they need.

The National and Community Service Act provides that structure, and the necessary funding. Americans have proven time and time again that they are willing to give of themselves in volunteer services, that the ethic of civic responsibility is still alive. In passing this legislation, the Senate makes itself a partner in those valuable efforts.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, we often discuss the problems our citizens are experiencing—overcrowded classrooms, understaffed care facilities for the elderly, diminishing forests. Therefore, I am pleased to be a cosponsor of the National and Community Service Act, which will encourage our Nation's citizens to become more involved in their communities, to contribute to the solutions of the problems facing society. I wish to congratulate the members of the Labor Committee who have brought to the Senate this legislation, which will provide a framework to channel the limitless energies of those who wish to serve their neighbors.

Since the time when a young President challenged our Nation to "ask not what your country can do for you; ask what you can do for your country," the idea of voluntarism and service to community and nation has lost its luster. The 1980's seemed to have been characterized by greed and avarice. As we enter the 1990's our Nation should commit itself once again to community service and involvement, to making the world in which we live a better place—this bill is the first step.

Once again we need our citizens to work together to build a better society. We need our citizens to participate in their neighborhoods—to strengthen the connection between individuals and the communities where they live. Young people who volunteer for national service become more self-reliant and develop a better understanding of their roles and responsibilities in the community. National service is a practical way for our citizens—young and old—to learn and grow through training, guidance, and group interaction.

The National and Community Service Act establishes school and community based programs to encourage students to serve their communities—by teaching the illiterate, by spending time with children in day care centers, by planting trees, working in recycling centers, helping with activities at senior citizens centers. The possibilities are limited only by the participants' imaginations. These summer and part-time positions would provide participants with productive work that would make them feel positive about themselves and their contributions; and these volunteer opportunities would provide important benefits for all the people served.

This legislation provides States with competitive grants to fund educational, environmental, public service, or public safety programs. College students would be encouraged to participate in community service programs with incentives such as academic credits, deferred or partially canceled loans or work-study options. As more and more people get involved, our neighborhoods, our communities and every person in America will be the winners.

I urge all of my colleagues to support the National and Community Service Act. By expanding volunteer efforts our citizens will help create more cohesive, connected communities. And, our communities will become more vital, more vibrant places to live.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I appreciate the patience of our colleagues as we have been trying to bring this legislative effort to a conclusion this evening. We have made some very substantial progress during the course of the day.

It had been my hope that we might have been able to conclude at a reasonable hour this evening. It is my understanding that we are down to probably one or two important items that remain to be addressed, and I recognize that we could conclude this evening, but we would probably go on into the evening for a period of time. It is acceptable to those who are offering the amendments to address these issues in the morning.

So it is my intention, and I have talked with the leader, and I believe the majority and minority leaders should be to bring this matter back on the floor as early as 10 tomorrow morning, so we can take up where we are right at this present time. I do believe we will be able to move the legislation and resolve it in an expeditious way which will permit us to address other measures tomorrow. So that is our intention.

I have talked this over with my colleague and comanager, the Senator from Utah, and this is an agreeable way for him as well. We have mentioned this to the Senator from Colorado, who has the pending amendment, and it is satisfactory to him.

We have not been able to get the attention of Senator NICKLES. We hope we will be able to resolve that particular issue, and we hope we will be able to announce something on that remaining item. Then hopefully, Mr. President, with the acceptance of the amendments of the Senator from California [Mr. WILSON] we will, in terms of what we have been notified at the present time, be ready to move toward a third reading.

That is currently the situation. I will let the majority leader make the definitive declaration about what, if anything, we are going to be doing for the remainder of this evening, but this legislation will go over until tomorrow morning.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield? As I understand it, for the benefit of our colleagues, I think it is correct there will be no further votes tonight.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. A little louder, please.

Mr. KENNEDY. The question on the votes or nonvotes really has to be stated by the majority leader, appropriately. There will not be votes on this particular measure.

The leader says that we can say it, so we have said it. There are no more votes. I am always glad to bring good news.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am glad to yield the floor.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. My understanding is that we will return to this at 10 tomorrow, but that we have not entered into any agreement as to when we will vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. There has been no agreement.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I am agreeable, although I am ready to vote tonight. I am ready to vote at any time.

The only concern I feel about this arrangement—and I am agreeable to it just to expedite the business of the Senate—is that I hope no Senator would feel that this would be the moment to offer a second-degree amendment that might confuse the issue. I would like to have a vote up or down on my amendment, or if somebody wants to move to table me, that is all right.

I will not be agreeable if the effort is to simply offer an amendment which confuses the issue. This is a simple matter. To bring in unrelated or extraneous issues as a second-degree amendment will, in my opinion, not expedite the work of the Senate and would not be a good practice. I hope no Senator will dream up that idea overnight. It is not something that is complicated or that requires a lot of refinement, and I hope we can dispose of it quickly in the morning.

I do not see other Senators seeking recognition. Therefore, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SIMON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for morning business with Senators permitted to speak therein for 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

IRISH-AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH—A TRIBUTE TO THE SHARED TRADITIONS AND VALUES OF THE UNITED STATES AND IRELAND

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today I am pleased to have joined Senators SIMON, KERRY, MOYNIHAN, KENNEDY, and others in introducing legislation to pay tribute to the contributions that Irish-Americans have made to the United States.

The United States enjoys a longstanding and friendly relationship with Ireland, due in large measure to the strong Irish strands in the fabric of America. Indeed, at the last census count, more than 40 million residents of the United States reported that they were of Irish descent. Irish-Americans have made an indelible mark on the many diverse aspects of American culture, and they have played an important part in our Nation's history.

The legislation we introduced would designate March 1990 as Irish Heritage Month. It also reaffirms the special relationship between the United States and Ireland at a time when events in Europe warrant a coherent response by the United States and its Western allies.

Yesterday, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hosted a private meeting with Irish Prime Minister, Charles J. Haughey, who is visiting Washington in conjunction with Ireland's ascendancy to the Presidency of the European Economic Community.

The EC will likely emerge as one of the primary actors in the formulation of a new order in Europe. Ireland, as president of the EC, will play an important role in that process. It is thus particularly timely that we in the United States reflect on our deep ties with Ireland and our common bonds with the Irish people.

Mr. President, it is clear that the United States has a real interest in designating March 1990 as Irish-American Heritage Month. Not only would the celebration be a fitting tribute to the contributions that Irish-Americans have made to U.S. society, but it would also solidify our friendship with a significant ally in Europe. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support this timely and important legislation.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Kalbaugh, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations and a treaty which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations and treaty received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 4:15 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives, delivered by Mr. Hays, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2742) to extend and amend the Library Services and Construction Act, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bill, without amendment:

S. 1016. An act to change the name of "Marion Lake", located northwest of Marion, Kansas, to "Marion Reservoir".

S. 2198. A bill to amend title XIX of the Social Security Act to reduce infant mortality through improvement of coverage of services to pregnant women and infants under the Medicaid Program; to the Committee on Finance.

INFANT MORTALITY AMENDMENTS OF 1990

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I rise to introduce the Medicaid Infant Mortality and Children's Health Act of 1990. This legislation amends the Medicaid Program to require States to provide health care coverage for pregnant women and infants up to 185 percent of the Federal poverty level by 1993; to phase in coverage for children up to age 18 from families living at or below 100 percent of the Federal poverty level; and to ensure adequate payment to disproportionate share hospitals for medically necessary care rendered to children under the age of 18.

Mr. President, for the past 3 years we have taken several important steps to address a problem that can only be characterized as a national disgrace. This proposal takes us one step further in attacking our failure to protect the lives of infants and children in America.

As we watch the amazing changes that are overtaking the world today, I am more and more convinced that the test of our leadership in the world will be the example we set in providing for the human needs of our own people. Our record on how we treat our children in America is less than exemplary. It is unacceptable that in America today, infant mortality is higher than in all other industrialized nations. In the past year alone we have slipped from 19th to 20th on the list of industrialized nations. More children die in America before the age of 5 than in East Germany and Singapore. It is also intolerable that our country, which pioneered the development of vaccines, should have a childhood immunization rate among nonwhite Americans which ranks behind 48 other countries including Albania and Botswana. A country that can put men on the Moon and can dream of sending men to Mars can surely find ways to add ounces to the birthweight of newborns.

Mr. President, the tools to attack this problem successfully do not require years of additional study and research. The travesty of America's shameful record on infant mortality and child health is underscored by the fact that we now know what will work. We know that adequate prenatal care can substantially reduce the chance of a woman giving birth to an infant with low birthweight or one who will die in infancy. Further progress would be made by ensuring that pregnant women have access to adequate nutrition, such as through the WIC Program, and to adequate information and treatment programs with respect to both legal and illegal substance abuse.

Each year, 40,000 infants die before their first birthday in America. A quarter of a million infants are born with low birthweight giving them 40 times the risk of a normal weight infant for dying; for survivors there is a substantial risk for significant lifelong health problems and hampered intellectual development. Early, adequate, and coordinated prenatal care can impact on these risks.

If the tools exist to attack the problem, then why are our children faced with such grim prospects at the start of their young lives? Access to comprehensive prenatal care in this country is not guaranteed. There are numerous barriers that a pregnant woman faces to getting care at a time when barriers should be far from her mind. Last year, as we have done for the past years, we took significant steps to erase financial barriers when we required that States provide Medicaid coverage for women up to 133 percent of the poverty level. This provided insurance coverage to approximately 112,000 women who would not have received coverage before the law was passed. Broadening the coverage to 185 percent of the poverty level as proposed in this bill will cover the pregnancies of an additional 223,000 women. This will mean that in the 2 years of the 101st Congress, we will have provided prenatal care coverage to 335,000 out of the 555,000 uninsured women giving birth. This is a good first step in trying to solve the problem.

Financial barriers are not the only barriers faced by women who need prenatal care. Insurance coverage without the provider network to give the needed care would be a paper victory for better care. Last year we attempted to deal with this problem by trying to ensure adequate payment to providers for Medicaid beneficiaries in order to guarantee that women have someone to go to. In addition, we began the process of trying to address some of the deep-seated social and cultural barriers that the most vulnerable women have to getting care. We attempted to cut bureaucratic redtape by encouraging coordination between Medicaid and the WIC Program. We also endorsed an important home-visiting concept that has the potential of enabling providers to reach out to women who feel alienated from the health care system and as a result do not get the care needed to ensure healthy babies. This legislation would enable States to opt to cover, under Medicaid, home-visiting programs.

Finally, Mr. President, last year, we took an important first step in trying to improve the health of our children. We provided Medicaid coverage to all children up to the age of 6 under 133 percent of the Federal poverty level. This year, with this bill, we will be phasing in coverage for children from age 7 to 18 under 100 percent of the poverty level. We will be allowing States to immediately cover these children as well as the 660,000 children up to the age of 6 whose parents earn between 133 and 185 percent of the Federal poverty level. Our children are our future, Mr. President. Our greatness as a nation is fully diminished by our reluctance to provide basic health care to our children. I believe it is time for us to redress this glaring omission.

I ask unanimous consent that the summary of the legislation and the text of the bill appear at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF THE INFANT MORTALITY AND CHILDREN'S HEALTH ACT OF 1990

1. INFANT MORTALITY PROVISIONS

a. Phased in Mandatory Coverage of Pregnant Women and Infants up to 185% of poverty.—Under current law, States must cover women and infants with incomes at or below 133% of poverty as of April 1, 1990. This provision phases in mandatory coverage of pregnant women and infants from the current law minimum of 133% of the Federal poverty level up to 150% by July 1, 1991, and up to 185% by July 1, 1993. It prohibits the application of resource tests for pregnant women and infants effective July 1, 1991. Under current law States have the option of imposing resource tests for pregnant women and infants.

b. Presumptive Eligibility.—The Medicaid eligibility determination process is often a barrier to the timely and appropriate receipt of prenatal care. States currently have the option to provide "presumptive eligibility" for pregnant women. This provision revises the current presumptive eligibility option for pregnant women by (1) extending the period of time by which the woman must file application for benefits and (2) extending the presumptive eligibility period to the date the State makes a final eligibility determination.

c. Optional Coverage of Home Visitation Services.—This provision allows the States, at their option, to offer coverage for prenatal and postpartum home visitation services to high-risk pregnant women or infants, as prescribed by a physician. Home visitation services can be effective in bringing necessary prenatal services to women who would otherwise be hidden from the health care system. The effective date is July 1, 1991.

2. CHILDREN'S HEALTH PROVISIONS

a. Phased in Coverage of Children up to 100% of poverty.—This provision phases in the mandatory coverage of all children in families with incomes below 100% of the Federal poverty level. Effective July 1, 1991, States would be required to cover all children below poverty born after September 30, 1983. So long as these children remained poor, they would continue to be eligible for Medicaid, up to age 18. Thus, poor children 7 and over would be "aged in" one year at a time so that by the year 2002, all poor children up to age 18 would be covered.

This bill also requires States to process applications for Medicaid benefits for pregnant women and infants and children at locations other than welfare offices, including hospitals and clinics. This provision will be effective July 1, 1991.

b. Optional Coverage of children up to Age 6 with incomes below 185% of the poverty level.—Under current law, effective April 1, 1990, States are required to cover all children born after September 30, 1983, up to age 6, in families with incomes at or below 133% of the poverty level. This provision allows States the option of extending Medicaid to these children with family incomes at or below 185% of the poverty level. Effective January 1, 1991.

c Optional Coverage of children up to age 18 with incomes below 100% of the poverty level.—States would be given the option to cover all children up to age 18 immediately with income levels below 100% of poverty.

d. Payment for Medically Necessary Services in Disproportionate Share Hospitals to Children under 18.—Under current law, with respect to infants under age 1 receiving medically necessary inpatient hospital service from disproportionate share hospitals, States may not limit the number of medically necessary inpatient hospital days they will cover, and, if they reimburse on a prospective basis, must make outlier adjustments for exceptionally high-cost or long-stay cases. These current law provisions would be extended beyond infants to all children under 18, effective July 1, 1991.

By Mr. PACKWOOD (for himself, and Mr. BOSCHWITZ):

S. 2199. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 with respect to the tax treatment of the transfer of excess pension assets to retiree health accounts, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

HEALTH AND LONG-TERM CARE SECURITY ACT

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation, the Health and Long-term Care Security Act of 1990, to increase access to affordable long-term care and retiree health benefits for the Nation's senior citizens.

This bill is the first part of a two-part plan I have been working on to address the health and long-term care needs of our seniors. The bill provides tax incentives to stimulate the private sector—employers and insurance companies—to offer affordable retiree health and long-term care benefits. The second part of my plan, which I will introduce in a separate bill in the next few months, will address access to long-term care for those least able to afford it.

Affordable health care is one of the most pressing issues facing our Nation today. Health-care expenditures in the United States have almost doubled over the last 25 years, rising from about 6 percent of GNP to 12 percent of GNP.

This trend is particularly troubling to seniors who typically live on a fixed income in their golden years. A year or so ago, I held several hearings in Oregon on this subject. The message was loud and clear: Seniors want access to affordable health and long-term care.

There are no easy answers to this problem. One thing I am convinced of, though, is that the solution is not a $60 billion Government-financed program for everyone. People who can afford to should plan now for their health and long-term care needs.

I believe employers can play a key role in this effort. Roughly 60 percent of all employers currently provide some kind of health benefits for retirees. The General Accounting Office estimates that the cost of providing these benefits to current employees and retirees exceeds $400 billion. Obviously, the cost will go up as the baby boom generation ages and the number of seniors double over the next 30 years. Faced with these staggering costs, it would be unfortunate if employers started curtailing the current level of retiree health benefits. It is important that we in Congress encourage employers to maintain the level of these benefits and to set aside money to pay for them. And we need to get more employers to offer these benefits. I believe my bill will do this.

The picture is very different for long-term care. Less than 50 U.S. employers currently offer long-term care benefits to employees. Yet a long-term illness is the most likely source of financial catastrophe for seniors. In fact, the single largest out-of-pocket expenditure for health care is for nursing home care. For example, in 1987, seniors and their families spent over $20 billion on nursing home care.

One of the biggest hurdles to affordable long-term care has been the lack of insurance. In 1986, only a hand full of insurance companies offered long-term care policies. While roughly 100 companies offer this coverage now, only a very small percentage of those expected to require long-term care are currently covered. The legislation I am introducing today should go a long way to stimulating more afforable insurance coverage for long-term care.

The size of the problem dictates that Congress must begin taking action now. My bill takes a first step by combining four provisions intended to expand private long-term care coverage and to assure that employers have sufficient funds to pay retiree health and long-term care benefits.

First, the bill clears up confusion in the current Tax Code over the tax treatment of long-term care expenditure and benefits. Long-term care will be treated like any other medical care. Thus, individuals will be able to deduct long-term care expenses as an itemized deduction on their Federal income tax return. Long-term care benefits will not be subject to Federal income tax. Employers will also be allowed to offer long-term care as one of the benefits that may be selected under a cafeteria plan. For purposes of this bill, long-term care means the care of an individual who requires assistance with daily living for a period of at least 90 days.

Second, the bill codifies an Internal Revenue Service ruling dealing with the tax treatment of long-term care insurance reserves held by an insurance company. This provision eliminates uncertainty over the deduction of the money set aside by an insurance company to pay benefits under long-term care policies, thereby opening the door for more innovative and affordable policies.

Third, the bill provides a new tax incentive for employers who wish to prefund—set aside funds—for retiree health and long-term care benefits for their employees. Employers will be allowed to prefund an annual retirement benefit of up to $1,500 per employee for long-term care and up to $1,500 per retiree for retiree health benefits.

Lastly, the bill allows employers to use excess pension assets—assets in excess of 150 percent of current pension liabilities—to pay for retiree health benefits. Employers will be allowed to make an annual transfer to a special retiree health account to cover the cost of the employer's retiree health liability for the year. Employers who elect to use excess pension funds for retiree health will be required to establish—but need not necessarily pay for nonadministrative costs of—a long-term care insurance program for employees and retirees within 2 years.

These provisions are described in more detail in the attached section-by-section description of the bill. Also attached are letters in support of the bill provided by the American Council of Life Insurance, the Association of Private Pension and Welfare Plans, and the Health Insurance Association of America.

In addition, I want to thank Congressman ROD CHANDLER for introducing this bill in the House of Representatives today. Congressman CHANDLER has been very interested in retiree health and long-term care and I look forward to working with him on these very important issues.

I believe this bill is an excellent first step in addressing the health and long-term care needs of our seniors. I hope that many of my colleagues will join with me and embrace the concepts in this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section analysis and the letters mentioned earlier be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION DESCRIPTION OF THE HEALTH AND LONG-TERM CARE SECURITY ACT OF 1990

Section 1. This section provides that the short title of the act shall be the "Health and Long-Term Care Security Act of 1990."

Section 101. This section clarifies that the term "medical care" under the tax code includes long-term care. Long-term care is defined as the care given to an individual requiring assistance with daily living for a period of at least 90 days. This will ensure that: 1. long-term care expenses can be deducted as itemized deductions, 2. long-term care benefits will be excluded from income, and 3. long-term care insurance may be offered to employees through a cafeteria plan.

Section 102. This section codifies Revenue Ruling 89-43 which provides that long-term care insurance reserves held by insurance companies may qualify as life insurance reserves.

Section 202. This section permits employers to set aside funds ("prefund") to provide an annual retirement benefit of $1,500 for retiree health care and $1,500 for long-term care. The prefunded amounts are subject to rules similar to the current tax law rules that apply to pension plan assets (including rules for vesting and actuarial funding of these benefits). The prefunded amounts will be portable. Retirees who are not eligible to receive prefunded benefits will be allowed to purchase long-term care insurance based on a group premium rate.

Section 301. This section provides that employers can use excess pension plan assets (assets in excess of 150% of current pension liabilities) to pay for retiree health costs. Employers will be allowed to make an annual transfer to a special retiree health account; the amount transferred cannot exceed the employer's retiree health liability for the year. Employers will not be required to immediately vest pension benefits or provide annuities to employees. Within two years from the date of the first transfer, employers must also establish (but not necessarily pay for non-administrative costs) a long-term care insurance program for employees and retirees.

STATEMENT OF THE ASSOCIATION OF PRIVATE PENSION AND WELFARE PLANS

Senator Bob Packwood and Representative Rod Chandler are to be commended for introducing today "The Health and Long-Term Care Security Act of 1990," legislation that addresses the health care security of millions of American workers and their families.

America's health care crisis is no more apparent than when a family is impoverished due to the costs of providing extended care for a loved one whose ability to function independently is severely limited. As we have known for some time, there is a huge need to encourage development of long-term care programs and benefits so that today's workers can protect themselves against the financial catastrophe that can result from severe and chronic illnesses. Senator Packwood and Representative Chandler have taken a big step toward filling that need today.

The Health and Long-Term Care Security Act wisely recognizes the major role played by the private employer system in the provision of health care to their employees and dependents. Today, private employers cover around 90 percent of their full-time employees and have been seeking for some time responsible ways to extend that protection and provide long-term care benefits. Permitting prefunding on both retiree health care benefits and long-term care benefits, as well as allowing the transfer of surplus pension assets for retiree health care accounts, will enable employers to meet this need. It is important to note that this legislation correctly decouples the issue of transferring surplus pension assets from the issue of pension plan termination reversions.

As America continues to age, the need for more long-term options will grow. In 1984 it was estimated that more than 25 percent of noninstitutionalized persons in America over age 64, and 41 percent of those aged 75 or older required long-term care. However, it is not a need confined to the elderly; from one-third to one-half of those who need long-term care are under age 65. And the demand for nursing home care will increase 80 percent between 1980 and the year 2000.

We can stave off a major crisis before it happens if we have the will. We look forward to working with Senator Packwood and Representative Chandler to achieve the laudable goal of this legislation to ensure that American employers will continue to provide for the health care security of their employees and families.

AMERICAN COUNCIL OF LIFE INSURANCE,
Washington, DC, February 27, 1990.

Hon. BOB PACKWOOD,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR BOB: Thank you for sharing a description of your proposed "Health and Long-Term Security Act of 1990." Your decision to address the challenge of financing long-term care is commendable.

Few individuals can finance an extended nursing home stay entirely out of current income and assets. However, we are convinced that many people will be able to provide for their long-term care needs through the purchase of long-term care insurance.

Your bill addresses one of the problems that we have encountered in developing and marketing long-term care insurance—the uncertainty of the tax treatment of these products. As we understand it, your bill clarifies the tax treatment of premiums and benefits received under a long-term care policy. In addition, the bill provides a major incentive to include long-term care among employer-provided benefits. Long-term care as an employee benefit offers great promise for quickly extending this protection to many Americans.

We urge you to consider including yet another tax clarification of a long-term care insurance approach that also offers great promise. This is the use of life insurance policies to provide long-term care help. With these policies, life insurance policyholders can accelerate their death benefits in order to meet the costs of long-term care. Again the tax treatment of these benefit payouts is uncertain and needs to be clarified.

You may count on our industry's support for these tax clarifications.

Sincerely,

RICHARD S. SCHWEIKER.

HEALTH INSURANCE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,
Washington, DC, February 27, 1990.

Hon. BOB PACKWOOD,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR PACKWOOD: On behalf of the Health Insurance Association of America I commend you on the introduction of legislation which will clarify that the term "medical care" includes long-term care in the Internal Revenue Code of the United States.

The legislation takes important steps toward stimulating the development of private long-term care insurance, especially employer-sponsored coverage, which has the greatest potential for reaching the most people. By providing tax treatment similar to that afforded health insurance, which has resulted in 90 percent of the insured population under age 65 receiving their health insurance through the workplace, it gives many important advantages to the insured.

Administrative and marketing costs per person covered drop dramatically when coverage is offered through the workplace. Favorable tax teatment is a strong inducement for employers themselves to pay some or all of the cost of the employee benefit, a further strong inducement for coverage. Furthermore, with the employer as the purchaser for the group, the buyer has access to more sophisticated market expertise, making for harder bargaining in the insurance marketplace. Premiums are lower and more affordable when people are younger and healthier.

With amendments such as those proposed in this bill, long-term care coverage can begin to be folded into this country's extensive private employee benefits system. Employers play an important role in selecting plans and educating their employees about benefits. These circumstances provide working age consumers more opportunities to gain information to understand their long-term care needs. It also benefits the workers' parents, since adult children often serve as financial advisors to their elderly parents. Employer-sponsored plans today also offer coverage for the parents of enrolled employees as well.

Enactment of the "Health and Long-term Care Security Act of 1990" would be a major step forward in the development of an extensive private long-term care insurance market, thus reducing the elderly's dependence on Medicaid. Stimulating the growth of a private insurance market for long-term care would benefit not only the elderly but would free up scarce public funds which would be able to be used for other critical needs. According to then HHS Secretary Bowen's report to the President on catastrophic illness expenses, 500,000 elderly a year spend down into Medicaid for nursing home care. Furthermore, the September 1987 Report to Congress by the HHS Task Force on Long-Term Health Care Policies estimated a savings of two Federal Medicaid dollars for each dollar of Federal revenue lost through tax incentives for private long-term care financing. Over half of Medicaid's current dollars go for funding long-term care.

By assisting middle and upper income Americans finance their own long-term care, your bill will make a major contribution towards freeing up needed tax dollars to provide for those who cannot provide for themselves.

Best regards,

LINDA JENCKES.●

By Mr. DASCHLE:

S. 2201. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to eliminate a means test applicable to determinations of eligibility of certain veterans for veterans' hospital care and other care and services; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

VETERANS' HOSPITAL CARE ENTITLEMENT FAIRNESS ACT

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Veterans' Hospital Care Entitlement Fairness Act of 1990, a bill that would eliminate the means test as a mechanism for restricting essential health care services to eligible veterans. The purpose of this measure is to ensure that all veterans, regardless of their assigned category, have access to VA health care services.

In 1986, the enactment of Public Law 99-272 established a means test for veterans' health care benefits. This law separated veterans into three categories based on their income and the service or nonservice origin of their condition.

As a member of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, I fought the establishment of the means test because I fervently believed, as I do today, that it is wrong for the Government to renege on its commitment to provide medical care to all our Nation's veterans. When these men and women entered the service, they were told they would receive free health care after they completed their military obligation. Now, when many veterans most need that benefit, it has been taken away from them.

For many veterans, the means test stretches their personal resources and raises questions about the value of their Government's commitments. Others, however, are not just inconvenienced by the means test. They are cut off from necessary health care. For these veterans, who took the Government's promise at face value and did not purchase private health insurance, an alternative to VA medical care simply does not exist.

Recently, I read about a veteran who, when he joined the Marine Corps in 1968, was told that "the real cost of war comes after the shooting stops." That veteran remarked that while he didn't fully understand what that statement meant at the time, he is now reminded of it every day he is unable to obtain health care at the local VA medical center. Sadly, the implementation of the means test is doing to many veterans what bullets and shrapnel did to their colleagues.

The Department of Veterans Affairs does not keep official statistics of exactly how many veterans seeking medical care have been turned away from VA medical facilities. However, VA officials estimate that during the first 5 months of this year around 170,000 veterans were denied care because of budget limitations and bed closings. Others suggest that as many as 120,000 veterans a week are being denied VA health care.

To the bureaucrats sitting at their desks in the bowels of the Department of Veterans Affairs, these may be just statistics, not worth tracking for the VA's official record. But, to veterans and their families in my State, they represent untold stories of human heartache, grief, and unfulfilled promises.

Because the Department of Veterans Affairs does not keep track of these veterans, I have been collecting the names of veterans in my State who have been told they can no longer rely on the VA for their health care needs. The 5-inch stack of letters I have received graphically demonstrates the extent of the VA health care crisis that exists in South Dakota. The letters, full of both pain and anger, share stories of empty Government promises and allude to the fear of growing old without the financial means to purchase private health insurance or receive needed health care.

As a Veterans' Service officer in South Dakota, recently wrote:

Many of the veterans that come to my office have told me they never carried health insurance because they were told they would be able to go to a VA hospital. Now they can't qualify for insurance because of their medical history, and the VA says they can't provide further care. This is happening at a time when World War II veterans are retiring in huge numbers.

Contrary to what past administration may have wanted us to believe, the veterans who are angry about having the doors of VA medical centers shut in their faces are not self-centered individuals simply looking for a Government handout. Rather, they are patriotic Americans who trusted their Government when it pledged to provide them VA health care services upon their discharge from the service. Now, many of these veterans are left emptyhanded, worrying about making ends meet on a fixed income and praying that their medical ailments won't force them to enter a private hospital for care they cannot afford.

As a veteran from Dante, SD, said:

I was one of those 18-year-olds that was drafted in 1945 . . . I'm not old enough for Medicare, so I'm a vet with poor health, financially battered from the agricultural crunch and health problems. I will count my blessings and wear a smile, but I do wonder how I can get by without health care at the VA hospital.

Another grim effect of the means test is its impact on farmers who are veterans. Under current regulations, which impose a $40,000 limit on assets, a farmer who owns a tractor outright is ineligible for VA health care. As a result, even though that farmer's annual income may be $1,000 or less—a situation which unfortunately has become quite common in South Dakota lately—he will be turned away from the VA hospital he had come to depend on for years for his medical care. For these farmers in my State, getting VA health care during the past several years has been as hard as getting rain for their crops.

It it interesting to note that at the time the means test was adopted, the National Academy of Science reported that the capacity of the hospital-based VA health care system was sufficient to meet the needs of the veterans who applied for care. Today, there is clear evidence that after the means test was established in 1986, the Reagan administration submitted budgets that failed not only to reflect the real demands placed on the medical centers, but even to keep pace with inflation. As a result, the VA health care budget plunged into the red at the same time I and other Members of Congress were being assured by administration officials that adequate funding was being requested.

Mr. President, one doesn't have to be a rocket scientist to determine what place the Nation's 27 million veterans occupied on the previous administration's list of spending priorities. In 1975, VA medical funding represented 5 percent of the total national budget. Now it represents less than 2.5 percent. Meanwhile, at the very time VA medical funding was shrinking, the veteran population was aging, and the VA was taking on a bigger patient load.

Since 1980, the VA has experienced a 7-percent increase in the number of inpatient admissions, a 29-percent increase in outpatient visits, and a 63-percent jump in nursing home patients. It did not take long for the irresistible force of this escalating VA patient load to meet the immovable object of the Reagan administration's realistic VA budgets.

Some have warned that if access to VA health care is further restricted, our Nation faces the possibility of VA hospitals becoming nothing more than holding wards for terminally ill patients who have no place else to go. This certainly is not the kind of health care system Congress envisioned, or the kind of health care system we promised our Nation's veterans when they consented to give up their personal liberty to serve in our Armed Forces.

President Kennedy acknowledged the debt of gratitude our Nation owes its veterans when he proclaimed, "never let it be said that our Nation forgot its soldiers." I cannot imagine that he would be proud of the means test. Rather than offering our hand to our Nation's veterans, we have chosen, instead, to offer them a cold shoulder, slamming hospital doors shut and sending our veterans elsewhere to obtain medical care.

Some well-meaning observers regret the means test, yet contend that the urgent need to combat our omnivorous Federal budget deficit requires its continuation. I reject that notion.

Early estimates on what it would cost to eliminate the means test vary widely—some suggest that it would cost little to no additional money to eliminate the means test while others estimate that it would add over $1 billion to the fiscal year 1991 budget. Even the highest estimate should not be prohibitive given the fact we have a budget that contains $4.3 billion for the development of the Stealth bomber, $12 billion for foreign aid, and $100 billion for Medicare.

Are the objectives of upholding our commitment to veterans and reducing the deficit incompatible in an era of limited resources? Clearly they are not. We simply have to get our priorities in order.

Mr. President, we can begin to renew our commitment to our Nation's veterans by eliminating the means test. The legislation I am introducing today does just that. It recognizes that our Nation made a moral commitment to its veterans that is not revocable. Elimination of the means test, however, is only half the equation. It must be accompanied by funding levels that will allow VA medical centers throughout the country to do their job.

Recent VA budget shortfalls have taken a toll on VA health care professionals as well as on veterans. For example, I read recently in the Federal Executive magazine that physicians in some VA medical centers were forced to help with emptying bed pans because of the severe shortage of VA personnel.

I have met with VA personnel in South Dakota and can attest to the fact that VA health care professionals are being asked to perform tasks far beyond those defined in their job descriptions. We cannot continue to ask these dedicated people to pick up more and more of the slack caused by inadequate VA health care budgets.

We are off to a good start in reversing the downward trend in VA medical care funding. I am pleased that the administration's fiscal year 1991 budget request earmarks $12.28 billion for the VA medical care account—an 8.4-percent increase over the amount appropriated and available for fiscal year 1990. This budget request recognizes the shortcomings of the Reagan administration, which submitted budgets to Congress that dangerously undermined the stability of the VA health care system. I am confident that we can build upon the administration's VA medical funding request to both restore veterans' confidence in our VA health care system and deliver the kind of quality care we promised.

I ask my colleagues to join me in supporting the Veterans' Hospital Care Entitlement Fairness Act of 1989 as the first step toward renewing the commitment proudly carved in stone outside the Department of Veterans Affairs: "To care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan."●

By Mr. FORD:

S. 2202. A bill to authorize the use of receipts from customs user fees to pay for additional customs personnel and services; to the Committee on Finance.

DISPOSITION OF CUSTOMS USER FEES

● Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation which addresses the pressing problem of Customs Service personnel. In 1986, Congress passed the Consolidated Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act [COBRA] which authorizes the collection of a $5 user fee for each passenger arriving from an overseas destination. Present law allows use of user fees revenue only for inspection overtime and unreimbursed costs in customs preclearance. User fee revenues cannot be used for regular staff position salaries and expenses. The bill that I am introducing today will allow use of the approximately $35 million a year in excess user fees to improve Customs Service staffing and equipment.

As chairman of the Aviation Subcommittee, I have had many airline executives, airport operators and community leaders raise this problem. There is no excuse for the current situation where passengers are sitting on planes for long periods after an overseas trip and international flights are being denied by the Customs Service because of budgetary limitations and staffing shortages. It is time that the surplus be spent to service the airport facilities that generated the user fee.

INS has been more responsive to increased demands for service than the Customs Service because of their ability to utilize all of the funds collected from its user fee statute. Customs role is different than INS and, therefore, requires a different user fee statute, but INS pays for its entire air and sea inspections program which includes positions and equipment with only one $5 air-sea passenger fee. Customs is only permitted to use its COBRA user fee collections on air-sea passengers, commercial truck-vessel-railcars and mail processing for overtime and certain preclearance expenses.

Allowing the Customs Service to use the surplus in the user fee collections is an opportunity for both the Government and the private sector alike to benefit and draw on each others' resources to meet the growing demands for customs Service across the country. The ability to purchase automation and information systems equipment to support customs personnel and for continued facilitation will benefit all the payors of the user fees. The funding of joint industry-customs research and development projects would speed up these efforts and bring them on-line and benefit the user more promptly than in the past.

I have firsthand knowledge of what can happen to an airport with inadequate Customs Service staffing. The Greater Cincinnati Airport has growth beyond belief since Delta Air Lines, Inc., established a hub there in 1985. Greater Cincinnati has two international flights already and has requested landing rights for nonstop service from Greater Cincinnati to Paris. The landing rights have been denied by the Customs Service due to staffing difficulties. The Customs Service has problems already at the Greater Cincinnati Airport as they do not have adequate staff for the passengers from London and Frankfurt. Many afternoon passengers are left on the plane while their connection takes off due to Customs staffing. The Customs people are working a full day at the downtown Cincinnati office before driving to the airport to process the present two international flights and there is no staff to handle another flight, so the rights have been denied. This is happening while the passenger is paying a $5 user fee for these services. Unfortunately, as the law is now written, the Customs Service cannot use the user fee for personnel and equipment.

Greater Cincinnati Airport is not the only facility to have these problems. In 1988, Customs Service directors in the field turned down every single request for landing rights for international services filed by one of the largest U.S. airlines. Mexicana Airlines was recently denied landing rights for new service from Mexico to Los Angeles and San Jose, CA. Such cases are often appealed to the Commissioner of Customs and it is very common for community leaders and airport operators and board members to appeal to their Members of Congress for assistance. I can just imagine what will happen if foreign carriers take advantage of the new open-skies policy.

The Department of Transportation recently issued an open-skies policy which will open up the U.S. market to foreign carriers to virtually every airport where domestic carriers are not providing nonstop or connecting service in the United States. This action has come about because a number of cities have been pressing for foreign service. There as a lot of media attention when the proposal was announced and there is always good press when the State Department has success in negotiating agreements that allow new service. What happens to the communities expecting service when the Customs Service cannot supply personnel? The Secretary of Transportation has taken the position in the open-skies policy that DOT will not decline to issue licenses for markets simply because they currently lack inspection facilities. What will happen, in my opinion, is that the Customs Service will be forced to steal resources from another airport to supply the new location. This is not a desirable way to conduct the Government's role in processing international passengers especially when airports are generating the user fees.

According to the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration, the number of international passengers to the United States has increased by over 40 percent while Customs personnel levels have remained the same. I cannot overstate the importance of tourism to the Nation's economy and it is one of the few areas where there is a favorable balance of expenditures. It is estimated that there will be a doubling of international trade and travel over the next 10 years which will require greater funds for the Customs Service. We must fix the problem now and one way is to allow the Customs Service to use the COBRA surplus to meet the immediate service demands of the airline industry and other payers of the fee. Increased staffing is immediately needed to service new work locations such as airports, land border ports and seaports, meet the workload growth as small to midsize airports become full-service Customs airports, and meet the multiple terminal expansion at existing airports. The Customs Service is now placed in the position of denying service to those paying a user fee while surplus money exists in the COBRA user fee account. It seems that an equitable method of distributing the surplus funds in the COBRA user fee account would be to divide the fund proportionately on the basis of fee paid. For airports and airlines about 70 percent of the surplus would benefit them.

I would urge my colleagues, especially those who serve on the Finance Committee to review this simple proposal. It is only fair for the paying passenger to be processed in a businesslike manner without undue delays due to inadequate staffing by the Customs Service.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2203. A bill to settle claims of the Zuni Indian Tribe, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

ZUNI CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Zuni Claims Settlement Act. This bill, which is being cosponsored by my colleague from New Mexico [Mr. BINGAMAN], would allow the Zuni Indian Tribe to rehabilitate and reclaim their natural resources that have been damaged, directly and indirectly, by misguided policies of the U.S. Government.

Located 40 miles south of Gallup, Zuni Pueblo encompasses 408,000 acres and is the largest of the 19 pueblos in New Mexico. The Zuni Valley has been occupied continuously from an early period. In 1540, Coronado visited Zuni during his famous search for the "Seven Cities of Cibola" and found a thriving community with a substantial agricultural base.

Since the United States gained sovereignty over New Mexico in 1846, the Zunis have lost 90 percent of their cultivated land to erosion. In the mid-19th Century, the Zunis were cultivating 10,000 to 12,000 acres of crops using traditional farming methods. Today only 1,370 acres are being cultivated. According to the best available evidence, the erosion of the Zuni's agricultural lands is directly due to the negligence and mismanagement of the U. S. Government, which led to destructive logging practices on adjoining National Forests, severe livestock overgrazing on the deforested lands, loss of mineral resources, destruction of archaeological sites, and unwise development of dams and reservoirs on and adjacent to reservation land.

The Zuni Claims Settlement Act would establish a $25 million trust fund to remedy these damages. Up to $1.2 million of the trust fund would be used to develop a Zuni Resource Development Plan for watershed rehabilitation, land protection, resource management, and renewable resource development. $8 million could be used to pay off loans and debts of the Zuni Tribe and for legal expenses related to the Zunis effort to obtain compensation for their damaged lands. The interest and investment income of the trust fund would be used to implement the Zuni Resource Development Plan to rehabilitate and reclaim the Zuni's land and to create, using traditional Zuni technology and state-of-the-art scientific methodology, a model of sustainable agricultural development.

Mr. President, this legislation is needed to remedy damages to the Zuni Pueblo that resulted from the actions of the United States Government.

I am pleased to be joined in this effort by Senator BINGAMAN and Representative RICHARDSON, who has agreed to introduce identical legislation in the House of Representatives. I look forward to quick action by the Congress on this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2203

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Zuni Claims Settlement Act of 1990".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) it is the policy of the United States to promote tribal self-determination and economic self-sufficiency and to support the resolution of disputes over historical claims through settlement;

(2) extensive damages to the trust lands within the Zuni Indian Reservation have occurred, including severe land erosion, loss of timber and minerals, spoilation of archaeological sites, and loss of the use of water;

(3) these damages have occurred, in part, by reason of acts and omissions of the United States in breach of its trust responsibilities;

(4) corrective measures are needed immediately to prevent continued degradation of tribal resources;

(5) the Zuni Indian Tribe has sought compensation from the United States for these damages through civil actions;

(6) further Indian prosecution of these claims will cause unnecessary stress on the working relationship between the Zuni Indian Tribe and the United States Government and delay cooperative efforts to remedy continuing problems; and

(7) a legislative settlement of these civil actions is appropriate because, notwithstanding any determination of liability, the United States retains a trust responsibility to the Zuni Indian Tribe for the continued protection of tribal resources.

ZUNI RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT PLAN

SEC. 3. (a) Before the first day of the third fiscal year beginning after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Interior and the Zuni Indian Tribe shall jointly formulate a Zuni resource development plan for the Zuni Indian Reservation, which shall include (but not be limited to)—

(1) a methodology for sustained development and management of renewable resources;

(2) a program of watershed rehabilitation;

(3) a computerized system of resource management and monitoring;

(4) programs for funding and training of Zuni Indians to fill professional positions that implement the overall plan;

(5) proposals for cooperative programs with the Bureau of Indian Affairs and other private or public agencies to provide technical assistance in carrying out the plan; and

(6) identification and acquisition of lands necessary to sustain Zuni resource development.

SEC. 3. (b) The Resource Development Plan shall be implemented in a manner that protects resources owned and controlled by the Zuni Tribe and promotes sustained yield development.

TRUST FUND

SEC. 4. (a) There is hereby established within the Treasury of the United States the Zuni Indian Resource Development Trust Fund (hereafter in this Act referred to as the "Trust Fund"). The Trust Fund shall consist of amounts appropriated to the Trust Fund and all interest and investment income that accrues on such amounts.

(b)(1) The Secretary of the Interior shall be the trustee of the Trust Fund and shall invest the funds in the Trust Fund with a financial institution.

(2) The Secretary of the Interior shall not deduct any amount from the Trust Fund for administrative expenses or charge the Zuni Indian Tribe for expenses incurred by the Secretary in acting as trustee.

(c)(1) The funds appropriated to the Trust Fund under the authority of section 6 shall constitute the corpus of the Trust Fund and may be expended, subject to paragraph (2), only for the following purposes:

(A) payment of any loans, debts, or future expenses incurred by the Zuni Indian Tribe to any person for the purchase of land or obtaining or defending rights of access to the area described in Public Law 98-408;

(B) payment of up to $600,000 per year for two years for the formulation of the Zuni resource development plan described in section 3;

(C) payment of all costs, attorneys' fees, and expenses incurred by the Zuni Indian Tribe in the prosecution of docket numbers 327-81L and 224-84L of the United States Claims Court; and

(D) payment of all invoices submitted by any person to the Zuni Indian Tribe for which proper vouchers have been received prior to September 30, 1990, and subsequently approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

(2) The total amount of the corpus of the Trust Fund that may be expended under paragraph (1) shall not exceed $8,000,000.

(3) The interest and investment income that accrues on the corpus of the Trust Fund may be expended by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to the Zuni resource development plan described in section 3.

(4) No funds appropriated under the authority of this Act may be used to make per capita payments to members of the Zuni Indian Tribe.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIMS

SEC. 5. (a) Upon the deposit into the Zuni Indian Resource Development Trust Fund of all the funds authorized to be appropriated under section 6, all claims of the Zuni Indian Tribe against the United States that are raised in docket numbers 327-81L and 224-84L of the United States Claims Court shall be considered to be extinguished.

(b) This compromise settlement is made without a finding of liability on the part of the United States with respect to the claims raised in docket numbers 327-81L and 224-84L of the United States Claims Court.

(c) The United States shall continue to have a trust responsibility to protect the resources of the Zuni Indian Reservation.

(d) No sums paid or forgiven pursuant to this Act shall be offset against any award of judgment against the United States which may be rendered in favor of the Zuni Indian Tribe in docket number 161-79L of the United States Claims Court. Any sums paid pursuant to this Act shall be considered to be in the nature of a settlement of claims in law and equity against the United States and shall not be considered for any purpose to be payments to the Zuni Indian Tribe pursuant to a contract, grant, loan, cooperative agreement, judgment, or other kind of appropriation.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 6. There are authorized to be appropriated to the Zuni Indian Resource Development Trust Fund $25,000,000. Such funds shall remain available without fiscal year limitation.●

By Mr. BENTSEN (for himself and Mr. DASCHLE):

S. 2204. A bill to amend the harmonized tariff schedule of the United States to clarify the tariff treatment of foliage-type artificial flowers of manmade fibers; to the Committee on Finance.

TARIFF TREATMENT OF FOLIAGE-TYPE ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, today I introduce a bill to clarify the law to prevent an inadvertent change in the tariff treatment of foliage made of manmade fibers that may have been occasioned by the changeover to the harmonized tariff schedule [HTS]. This bill would clarify that the 9-percent tariff provided under subheading 6702.90.40 does not apply merely to artificial flowers of manmade fibers but applies generally to articles described under heading 6702 (artificial flowers, foliage and fruit and parts thereof and articles made of artificial flowers, foliage or fruit) when made of manmade fibers.

Prior to implementation of the HTS, artificial flowers and foliage of manmade fibers were subject to a 9 percent tariff. Since last November, however, the Customs Service has assessed a 17-percent duty on imports of artificial foliage, but not flowers, of manmade fibers because of an inadvertent change in the tariff schedules made in the conversion to the HTS which Customs did not notice until that time.

This new interpretation has caused problems for importers who have longstanding pricing agreements with their customers and will not be able to pass on the increased duty for some time. I also understand that it is difficult for Customs to administer different tariff rates for artificial flowers and artificial foliage because it is sometimes difficult to distinguish flowers from foliage. Nonetheless, Customs does not believe it has the authority to change its interpretation of the tariff provision. Therefore, I am introducing this bill to clarify that Congress did not intend to limit the 9-percent tariff provided under subheading 6702.90.40 to artificial flowers of manmade fibers.

It appears that there is no U.S. manufacturer of artificial foliage of manmade fibers, and domestic interests should not be harmed by this clarification.

In sum, Mr. President, I believe that this legislation is desirable and noncontroversial, and I urge my colleagues to support it. I ask uanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2204

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. FOLIAGE-TYPE ARTIFICIAL FLOWERS.

Subheading 6702.90.40 of the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States (19 U.S.C. 3007) is amended by striking out "Artificial flowers, of" in the article description and inserting in lieu thereof "Of".

SEC. 2. EFFECTIVE DATE.

(a) IN GENERAL.—The amendment made by this Act shall apply with respect to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption, after the date that is 15 days after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) RELIQUIDATION.—Notwithstanding section 514 of the Tariff Act of 1930 or any other provision of law, upon a request filed with the appropriate customs officer before the date that is 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, any entry, or withdrawal from warehouse for consumption, of an article described in heading 6702.90.40 of the Harmonized Tariff Schedule of the United States (as amended by this Act) that was made—

(1) after December 31, 1988, and

(2) on or before the date that is 15 days after the date of enactment of this Act, shall be liquidated or reliquidated as though such entry or withdrawal occurred on the day after the date that is 15 days after the date of enactment of this Act.●

By Mr. MITCHELL (for himself and Mr. COHEN):

S. 2205. A bill to designate certain lands in the State of Maine as wilderness; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

MAINE WILDERNESS ACT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague BILL COHEN in introducing the Maine Wilderness Act of 1990.

Identical legislation is being introduced today in the House by Representatives SNOWE and BRENNAN.

This legislation will designate 12,000 acres in the Caribou-Speckled portion of the White Mountain National Forest in Maine as wilderness.

The Caribou-Speckled Mountain roadless area contains 16,000 acres. The area is 2 hours north of Portland and lies entirely within the State of Maine.

The western edge of the area is State Route 113 where the road is the boundary between New Hampshire and Maine. U.S. Highway 2 is to the north of the area and Maine Route 5 is to the east.

The topography varies from lush river valley to exposed rocky peaks. The highest point is Speckled Mountain. Other peaks include Caribou, Peabody, Durgin, and Ames Mountains. Two major ridges are Blueberry Ridge, running between Blueberry Mountain and Ames Mountain and Red Rock Ridge, running between Miles Notch and Speckled Mountain.

Recreation use of the area historically includes hunting, fishing, cross-country skiing, snowshoeing, snowmobiling, hiking, and camping. They use peaks from June to September.

There are 36 miles of trails inside the roadless area boundary which includes 13 different trails. Winter use is dependent on the amount of snowfall.

This area, one of the last large undeveloped tracts of land in Maine, contains no roads, has not seen any logging for many years, contains a wide variety of wildlife and plant species, and many spectacular views and opportunities for solitude and relative isolation from the intrusions of modern life.

Enactment of this legislation will add an additional 12,000 acres as wilderness to the White Mountain National Forest. With 102,000 acres already designated, 14 percent of the forest is now protected as wilderness.

Enactment of this legislation will add an additional 12,000 acres designated as wilderness in Maine. There is some land in Maine designated as wilderness now—5,000 acres in the Moosehorn National Wildlife Refuge. In addition, 36,000 acres in the Allagash Wilderness Waterway are managed as wilderness.

The Maine congressional delegation has arrived at this point after an extended process of public discussion, study, evaluation, deliberation, negotiation, and compromise involving the Forest Service, the delegation, and a variety of interested parties including the timber products industry, conservation groups, State and local governments, snowmobiles, and regional planning agencies.

In 1983, the issue of wilderness designation for Caribou-Speckled arose in the context of the New Hampshire Wilderness bill. In order to get a reasoned view of this matter, the delegation asked representatives of industry, State, conservation, and recreation interests to serve on an ad hoc committee.

That committee conducted its work while the Forest Service was in the process of conducting its development of the forest's 10-year management plan.

In the fall of 1984, the Forest Service, in a draft management plan recommended that 12,000 of the 16,000 acres in Caribou-Speckled be studied by Congress for possible wilderness designation.

The remaining 4,000 acres were to be released for multiuse.

In the Forest Service's final plan, some modifications to the originally proposed wilderness area were made, but the recommendation to designate 12,000 acres as wilderness and release 4,000 acres for multipleuse remained the same.

The ad hoc committee, by a 9-to-2 vote, agreed to the Forest Service proposal.

In November 1987, the congressional delegation held a hearing in Bethel, ME, on the wilderness recommendation. We heard from a wide number of individuals and groups on the recommendation.

Mr. President, this bill represents a compromise that we believe balances the many, some times competing interests this Nation places on its national forest.

Originally, a number of conservationists had pressed for wilderness designation for the entire 16,000 acres of Caribou-Speckled. Many representatives of the forest products industry on the other hand opposed any wilderness designation for Caribou-Speckled.

They have compromised and as a result, 4,000 acres of the roadless area will be released for mixed use management. If no action is taken, the entire 16,000 acres will remain managed by the Forest Service so as to retain its wilderness character.

The issue would remain unresolved, there would be no access to the area's timber by local wood-using industries and there would be no permanent protection of the area as wilderness.

I hope that the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry will be able to consider this legislation in the coming weeks and we will be able to finally conclude the debate over wilderness designation for Caribou-Speckled.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2205

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Maine Wilderness Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. DESIGNATION OF WILDERNESS AREAS.

In furtherance of the purpose of the Wilderness Act (16 U.S.C. 1131-1136), certain lands in the White Mountain National Forest, in the State of Maine—

(1) which comprise approximately twelve thousand acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Caribou-Speckled Mountain Wilderness—Proposed", dated January 1987; and

(2) which shall be known as the Caribou-Speckled Mountain Wilderness, are hereby designated wilderness, and, therefore, as components of the National Wilderness Preservation System.

SEC. 3. MAPS AND DESCRIPTIONS.

As soon as practicable after enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall file a map and a legal description of the wilderness area designated by this Act with the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Agriculture of the United States House of Representatives and with the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry of the United States Senate. The map and description shall have the same force and effect as if included in this Act, except that correction of clerical and typographical errors in such map and description may be made by the Secretary. The map and description shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the Chief of the Forest Service, Department of Agriculture.

SEC. 4. ADMINISTRATION OF WILDERNESS.

Subject to valid existing rights, the wilderness area designated by this Act shall be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with the provisions of the Wilderness Act governing areas designated by that Act as wilderness, except that any reference in such provisions to the effective date of the Wilderness Act shall be deemed to be a reference to the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 5. WILDERNESS REVIEW CONCERNS.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the Department of Agriculture has completed the second roadless area review and evaluation program (RARE II); and

(2) the Congress has made its own review and examination of National Forest System roadless areas in the Maine section of the White Mountain National Forest and of the environmental impacts associated with alternative allocations of such areas.

(b) DETERMINATION.—On the basis of such review, the Congress hereby determines and directs that—

(1) without passing on the question of the legal and factual sufficiency of the RARE II final environmental statement (dated January 1979) with respect to National Forest System lands in the State of Maine; such statement shall not be subject to judicial review with respect to National Forest System lands in the State of Maine;

(2) with respect to the National Forest System lands in the State of Maine which were reviewed by the Department of Agriculture in the second roadless area review and evaluation (RARE II) and those lands referred to in subsection (d), that review and evaluation or reference shall be deemed for the purposes of the initial land management plans required for such lands by the Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act of 1974, as amended by the National Forest Management Act of 1976, to be an adequate consideration of the suitability of such lands for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System and the Department of Agriculture shall not be required to review the wilderness option prior to the revisions of the plans, but shall review the wilderness option when the plans are revised, which revisions will ordinarily occur on a ten-year cycle, or at least every fifteen years, unless, prior to such time, the Secretary of Agriculture finds that conditions in a unit have significantly changed;

(3) areas in the State of Maine reviewed in such final environmental statement or referenced in subsection (d) and not designated wilderness upon enactment of this Act shall be managed for multiple use in accordance with land management plans pursuant to section 6 of the Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act of 1974, as amended by the National Forest Management Act of 1976: Provided, That such areas need not be managed for the purpose of protecting their suitability for wilderness designation prior to or during revision of the initial land management plans;

(4) in the event that revised land management plans in the State of Maine are implemented pursuant to section 6 of the Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act of 1974, as amended by the National Forest Mangement Act of 1976, and other applicable law, areas not recommended for wilderness designation need not be managed for the purpose of protecting their suitability for wilderness designation prior to or during revision of such plans, and areas recommended for wilderness designation shall be managed for the purpose of protecting their suitability for wilderness designation as may be required by the Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act of 1974, as amended by the National Forest Management Act of 1976, and other applicable law; and

(5) unless expressly authorized by Congress, the Department of Agriculture shall not conduct any further statewide roadless area review and evaluation of National Forest System lands in the State of Maine for the purpose of determining their suitability for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System.

(c) REVISION.—As used in this section, and as provided in section 6 of the Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act of 1974, as amended by the National Forest Management Act of 1976, the term "revision" shall not include an "amendment" to a plan.

(d) APPLICATION OF SECTION.—The provisions of this section shall also apply to National Forest System roadless lands in the State of Maine which are less than 5,000 acres in size.

SEC. 6. PROHIBITION ON BUFFER ZONES.

Congress does ot intend that the designation of a wilderness area in the State of Maine lead to the creation of protective perimeters or buffer zones around the wilderness area. The fact that nonwilderness activities or uses can be seen or heard from within the wilderness area shall not, of itself, preclude such activities or uses up to the boundary of the wilderness area.

SEC. 7. CONTROL OF FIRE, INSECTS, AND DISEASES.

As provided in section 4(d)(1) of the Wilderness Act, such measures may be taken within wilderness areas designated by this Act as may be necessary in the control of fire, insects, and diseases, subject to applicable laws and such additional reasonable conditions as the Secretary deems desirable. This shall include the use of herbicides for plant and noxious weed control and the practice of reseeding a badly damaged area.

SEC. 8. STATE FISH AND WILDLIFE AUTHORITY.

As provided in section 4(d)(7) of the Wilderness Act, nothing in this Act shall be construed as affecting the jurisdiction or responsibilities of the State of Maine with respect to wildlife and fish in the national forests in Maine.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleague from Maine, Senator MITCHELL, in sponsoring legislation that designates a 12,000-acre wilderness area in the White Mountain National Forest in Maine. The area would be called the Caribou-Speckled Mountain Wilderness. Identical legislation is being introduced in the House by Representatives OLYMPIA SNOWE AND JOSEPH BRENNAN.

In designating the 12,000-acre wilderness area, this legislation would also release an additional 4,000 acres to multiple use, including timber harvesting as called for in the land and management plan for the White Mountain National Forest. I believe this provision will end uncertainty over the future management of the entire 16,000-acre roadless area that was reviewed by the U.S. Forest Service during the development of the forest plan, and that is currently being managed as wilderness.

Finally, the bill reiterates language in the Wilderness Act that authorizes continued State regulation of fish and game activity in the area and allows the Forest Service to take whatever measures are deemed appropriate to control fire, insects, and disease in the wilderness area.

Our legislation is based not only on the Forest Service's forest plan recommendations, but also on the recommendation of the Maine Ad Hoc Wilderness Committee, established by the Maine congressional delegation in 1983. The committee consisted of representatives of the forest products industry, environmental groups, local and State government, snowmobilers, and others. In 1984, the committee voted in favor of the Forest Service's preferred alternative, which was the designation of the 12,000-acre wilderness area and the release of the remaining 4,000 acres to multiple use.

Since then, the Forest Service issued its final plan for the White Mountain Forest, which included the 12,000-acre wilderness recommendation. Extensive public comment was received by the Service, and significant support for the wilderness designation was evident at that time. In addition, the delegation held a public hearing in Bethel, ME, in November 1987 at which time further public comment was solicited.

While the issue of wilderness designation is controversial in Maine, as it is in many areas of the country, the delegation has agreed, after reviewing the circumstances in Maine, that the resolution of this matter as proposed is in the best interests of Maine citizens.

Designation of the 12,000-acre Caribou-Speckled wilderness will preserve a relatively undeveloped parcel of forestland for future generations. Maine has few large areas of public land suited to the wilderness experience—Baxter State Park and the Moosehorn National Wildlife Refuge are among the few that meet this standard. The creation of the Caribou-Speckled wilderness area will add another dimension to this experience, since it differs from the type of forest found in the other areas. The Caribou-Speckled forest is a deciduous hardwood one, with two mountain peaks a few miles apart. To the west, hikers can view the majestic peaks of Mount Washington and other mountains in the White Mountain range. Views in other directions provide a panorama of western Maine's foothills and rolling mountains. There are few preserves of this kind in Maine, and certainly none of this size.

The other component of our bill, the release of the remaining 4,000 acres, provides the means for the forest products industries and other nonwilderness users to have access to forest resources. Timber sales are scheduled in this area beginning in 1991, and this will allow for adequate timber supply levels.

Since the Forest Service issued its recommendation in 1986, the entire 16,000-acre area has been managed as wilderness. If the delegation did not act on the 12,000-acre recommendation, the remaining 4,000-acre area would remain off limits to timber harvesting and other nonwilderness uses for an indefinite period of time.

Under the provisions of the National Forest Management Act, the Forest Service is expected to revise its forest plans every 10 to 15 years. A review of the White Mountain National Forest would therefore begin between the years 1996 and 2000. At that time, the Forest Service would again review the 16,000-acre roadless area, but there is no precedent to show that the agency would, or could alter its recommendation and release the entire area or a lesser portion of it to nonwilderness uses.

Just what the Forest Service would do is unknown, and I believe that this situation is the worst of all possible worlds. The uncertainty and debate over this matter would go on, to no one's benefit, for many years to come. There is little reason to allow this to happen when it had been debated so extensively already.

Since wilderness is one of the forms of multiple use included in the Multiple-Use Sustained Yield Act and is sanctioned in the Wilderness Act of 1964, it is important that it be offered as an option for the public, where appropriate. It is certainly appropriate in this case.

At the same time, local industries depend on the National Forest for much of their timber supply. It is also important that this relationship be maintained so that the quality sawlogs needed by the forest products firms continue to be made available. The Forest Service has stated, in its environmental impact statement, that the designation of the 12,000-acre wilderness would not diminish that supply.

Overall, this compromise should bring about the most balanced use of the national forest in Maine. Those who desire to hike and camp in the forest in relative solitude will have that opportunity, but the tradition of access to public timber by forest-dependent industries in Maine will also continue.

I believe it is time to act on this proposal, and I hope the Senate will look favorably on it.

By Mr. CRANSTON:

S. 2206. A bill to enhance exports by eliminating Government-imposed obstructions to freer trade; to the Committee on Finance.

EXPORT ENHANCEMENT ACT OF 1990

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, today I am introducing two separate bills to give our exporters the tools they need to compete in the rapidly changing world by eliminating U.S. Government-imposed obstructions to freer trade. The first bill, the Export Enhancement Act of 1990, is comprised of two titles: The first title is an overhaul of the Export Administration Act. The second title provides trade and investment benefits for Eastern Europe. The other bill I am introducing, the Export Administration Act of 1990, is simply title I of the first bill. I have introduced the bills separately for jurisdictional reasons. A statement on the Export Administration Reform Act accompanies that bill in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Export Enhancement Act and a section-by-section analysis of the Export Enhancement Act of 1990 follow this statement.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2206

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS: EXPORT ENHANCEMENT ACT OF 1990

TITLE I: EXPORT ADMINISTRATION ACT

Section 101. Controlled Countries.—This section requires the President to review the current list of controlled countries and make a determination as to whether all countries on the list should remain. He must also review the criteria in the Act for determining a controlled country and report to Congress his recommendations for change.

Section 102. Exports to Eastern Europe.—Adds a new subsection 8 to Section 5(b). This section creates a "China Green Line" for the emerging democracies of Eastern Europe. Items that can now be exported to the People's Republic of China without COCOM approval will be allowed for Eastern Europe by establishing a new, higher national discretion level.

Section 103. Soviet Reform.—Adds a new section (r) to Section 5. This section requires the President to identify non-military sectors that would help the economic reforms in the Soviet Union (e.g., telecommunications, financial institutions, environmental protection). Technology in these sectors would then be eligible for export at levels higher than currently allowed. In addition, the bill stipulates that there must be consistent liberalization across product lines to allow the projects to be completed.

Section 104. Bulk Licenses.—Amends 4(a)(2). This section allows a form of bulk license to Eastern European countries, making it easier for exporters to send numerous shipments of the same items to preapproved end-users. This provision is similar to what was done for the PRC in the 1988 trade bill.

Section 105. Trade Shows.—Amends 5(e)(6). This section allows items to be exported for trade shows that would not otherwise be exportable, as long as certain conditions are met. Again, this is similar to actions taken in 1988 for the PRC. Exceptions for certain technologies would be made in the case of trade shows in the Soviet Union.

Section 106. Exports to COCOM.—Replaces Section 5(a)(4). This section establishes a license-free COCOM. It mandates that within one year of enactment, no validated licenses may be required for exports to COCOM or 5(k) nations (except certain end-users specified by Commerce). In addition, no reexport controls would be required to or from COCOM.

Section 107. Dual Use Items.—Replaces Section 17(b). This section gives the Commerce Department sole authority to determine what is controlled under this Act (State would still maintain and control the munition list). This provision also mandates that there be no overlap between Commerce's dual-use list and State's munitions list. If another agency disagrees with Commerce's decision that something is dual-use, they can petition Commerce to resolve the disagreement. If the two agencies can't agree within 20 days, it must be sent to the President. He then has 20 days to make a determination, and if no action is taken, Commerce's ruling stands.

Section 108. Representation on the Coordinating Committee.—Amends Section 15(a). This section gives Commerce a permanent representative at COCOM and requires the Administration to report to Congress on why Commerce should not be the lead agency. Currently, State leads the U.S. delegation to COCOM and Defense has a permanent representative in Paris, but Commerce doesn't.

Section 109. Treatment of Newly Industrialized Countries.—Amends Section 5(k). This section requires the Administration to review the sophistication of goods and technology available in the NICs and determine if those technologies warrant multilateral controls. If so, the U.S. should work with our COCOM allies to get these countries to join the multilateral control system.

Section 110. Regulatory Authority.—Amends Section 15(b). This section gives Commerce the authority to issue regulations to administer export controls without the concurrence of any other agency, unless expressly stated otherwise in the Act.

Section 111. Indexing.—Amends Section 5(g)(1). This section changes the current indexing provision to state that the Secretary shall index performance levels (where appropriate), instead of "may".

Section 112. Control List.—Replaces Section 5(c)(7). This section creates a sunset provision. All items on the control list will automatically be decontrolled to Free World destinations after two years unless Commerce formally determines controls should remain. The Administration will then have to take a list of the decontrolled items to COCOM immediately to advocate multilateral East/West decontrol.

Section 113. DOD Review.—Amends Section 5(p). This section moves Defense's authority in the review process from the Undersecretary for Defense Policy to the Undersecretary for Acquisitions, where the Militarily Critical Technologies List is made and there is greater technical expertise.

Section 114. Limitation of Controls.—Amends Section 5(d)(1). This section deletes a phrase to ensure that controls cover, and are limited to, items which are militarily critical.

TITLE II: TRADE AND INVESTMENT

Section 201. Most Favored Nation Status.—This section amends Title III of P.L. 101-179 (SEED I) and urges the President to waive Jackson-Vanik and grant MFN status for Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, East Germany, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania and the Soviet Union.

Section 202. Eligibility for Generalized System of Preferences.—This section amends Section 502(b) of the Trade Act of 1974 to allow Czechoslovakia, East Germany and the Soviet Union to be eligible for GSP.

Section 203. Eligibility for OPIC Programs.—This section amends Section 239(f) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to allow Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, East Germany and Romania to be eligible for Overseas Private Investment Corporation programs.

Section 204. Export-Import Bank Programs.—This section allows Ex-Im funding for projects in Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, East Germany and Romania.

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. DODD, and Mr. ADAMS):

S. 2207. A bill to amend the Export Administration Act of 1979; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

EXPORT ADMINISTRATION REFORM ACT OF 1990

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I rise to introduce a major piece of legislation that will remove more than a dozen serious impediments to U.S. export expansion. For too long, our Government has been a hindrance to exporters, instead of a partner. We must turn that around; this bill will turn that around. When enacted, this legislation will significantly enhance our exporters' ability to compete in Eastern Europe, Asia, and worldwide. The world order is rapidly changing, presenting our exporters with new market opportunities around the globe. We as a Nation must be prepared to act swiftly and decisively to take advantage of these opportunities. In reauthorizing the Export Administration Act this year, we have a unique chance to reform the system significantly so as to eliminate Government-imposed obstructions to freer trade. We must not miss this chance.

The legislation I am introducing today will give businesses the tools they need to increase exports by penetrating new markets and expanding within existing markets. We have a vested interest in the success of the economic and political reforms in Eastern Europe. We must lend a helping hand to these countries, and help American businesses to gain a foothold in their markets. If the Government maintains excessive controls that are not multilateral, our exporters will never be able to crack these potentially large markets. In rewriting the Export Administration Act, I propose an all-out attack on the impediments in the current export control regime. This will greatly expand the export opportunities of our high-technology companies in Eastern Europe and throughout the world.

Three years ago, I introduced the High-Technology Trade Enhancement Act. My goal in that bill was to streamline the export control system, decontrolling items that did not pose a threat to our national security and ending the Defense Department's de facto veto over dual-use controls. Much of my bill was incorporated into the Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act of 1988. Unfortunately, there is still much more to be done. The reforms I am proposing today are aimed at completing this unfinished business.

In addition, because of the incredible changes in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, I am proposing several reforms specifically aimed at easing restrictions to those countries. We must not waste this once in a lifetime opportunity to make the most of, and to encourage, the reforms in those countries. In light of the changing strategic environment, it is imperative that we rethink the fundamental premise which underlies our export control regime. Therefore, I am calling for the administration to reevaluate the status of all currently controlled countries—that is: The Soviet bloc and the criteria for determining which countries should be controlled and to report to Congress on its findings.

Let me briefly outline the other major export control provisions in the bill: With regard to Eastern Europe, I propose establishing a new, higher threshold for items that will be exportable without multilateral approval. Specifically, I suggest that items which can now be shipped to the People's Republic of China without approval should be allowed to Eastern Europe. This is the so-called "China green line." Surely if it's not against our national interest to export to the repressive Communist regime in China, it should not be against our interests to export to the blooming democracies of Europe. To ensure that our exporters aren't then disadvantaged by multilateral decontrol that isn't followed in the United States, there would be a presumption of approval for items under the green line. The bill will also allow the use of trade show and bulk licenses for certain items exported to Eastern Europe.

As President Havel of Czechoslovakia stated so dramatically last week before the joint session of Congress, "You can help us most of all if you help the Soviet Union on its irreversible but immensely complicated road to democracy." I share his view and believe it's in our national interest to enhance the reform process in the Soviet Union and to increase United States-Soviet trade. Therefore, although I think it may be premature to allow all goods up to the green line to the Soviet Union, my bill calls for the Secretary of Commerce to identify sectors in the Soviet Union that would qualify for a significantly higher level of technology than is currently permitted. For example, we could help the Soviets in areas such as telecommunications, finances, and environmental protection. In identifying these sectors, the President must make sure that all goods and technology needed to advance the favored sectors are given preferential treatment.

Mr. President, representatives of the administration recently returned from a COCOM meeting in Paris. While the U.S. position has progressed for the better in recent months, it is obvious that the United States is still the "odd-man out" in COCOM. If the administration doesn't act quickly and become more flexible in its position, there is a very real chance that COCOM will fall apart at the seams. I doubt that's what the administration wants. Congress should assert itself on this issue by using the reauthorization of the EAA to move the administration in the right direction.

My bill also contains major reforms concerning trade with Asia and the rest of the free world, as well as the administration of the control system. Regrettably, no matter what reforms we legislate, the administration seems to drag its feet and get bogged down in interagency disputes. Therefore, I am proposing that the jurisdiction over dual-use items be clarified once and for all. While the Commerce Department and the State Department are haggling, our exporters are losing sales. This bill will provide Commerce with the sole authority to determine what is dual-use and will set up a dispute settlement mechanism with strict time limits. I am also calling for a license-free Cocom. The trade bill intended this, but the administration has refused to take action. A license-free Cocom is absolutely essential, particularly in light of the fact that the European Community will soon eliminate all internal barriers. If the United States is the only country requiring licenses, our exporters might as well hang up the "gone fishin" sign, because it will be all over.

Mr. President, the bill has several other important provisions which create a smoother, more rational system of controls. While this bill will provide considerable relief to our exporters, it is not meant to address all the problems of the Export Administration Act and its implementation; nor is it a comprehensive statement of my priorities. This legislation is simply an important first step toward a more efficient and effective control system.

There are many other issues that could, and should, be addressed at this time. Frankly, I think we must reevaluate the entire premise of the current control regime—is it really appropriate in light of the changes occurring in the world? I have always, and continue to, question the role of the Defense Department in the system—is it necessary, particularly now, for DOD to be involved in West/West trade? Should DOD look at individual licenses at all, or should it only give technical advice on what is militarily critical? What role should the State Department play? Is it really the best qualified to administer the munitions control list? Should Commerce provide one-stop shopping for export licenses? Or at a minimum, should there be one entry point for all licenses to avoid confusion and possible duplication? Shouldn't Commerce have the authority to do overseas investigations to enforce the act? Don't we need a better definition of "defense article" what more accurately reflects the realities of today's high-technology world? Are there ways that the foreign policy controls and the Arms Export Control Act can be reformed? These are just some of the many questions we should address in the near future. As a member of both the Banking and Foreign Relations Committees, I look forward to doing just that.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to review this bill carefully and join as cosponsors. It is moderate in scope, but essential not only to the health of our exporters, but for the economic and political success of the reformers in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill follow my statement.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2208. A bill to provide for issuance of a 7-day admission permit for the Grand Circle Adventure comprising seven national parks in Utah, Colorado, and Arizona; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

GRAND CIRCLE ADVENTURE PASS

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a bill that is for the benefit of every traveler who visits the beautiful State of Utah. I am pleased Senator GARN is joining me as a cosponsor.

The State of Utah is the proud keeper of five national parks: Arches National Park, Canyonlands National Park, Capitol Reef National Park, Bryce Canyon National Park, and Zion National Park. These five parks, with the addition of Arizona's Grand Canyon North Rim National Park and Colorado's Mesa Verde National Park, comprise what is known as the Grand Circle Adventure area.

Presently, visitors who wish to visit the Grand Circle Adventure area must either pay a daily admittance fee of $5 each day they enter a park or purchase an entire season pass for $25. My bill would offer a 7-day pass for visitors who wish to visit the Grand Circle Area and its monuments for a 1-week time period. The Grand Circle Adventure pass would cost approximately $15 and would make visiting all the parks in the area an easier and more convenient wilderness experience.

Utah, with its five national parks all within convenient driving distance of one another, stands in a unique position. Only California has as many national parks as Utah—and even California's parks are not within the easy driving distance of one another quite like those of Utah.

Mr. President, this is a good bill, written with the American tourist's best interest in mind. It has enjoyed enthusiastic support from all parties concerned. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation and help establish a Grand Circle Park pass in Utah.

At this point I ask unanimous consent that my bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2208

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. GRAND CIRCLE ADVENTURE PASS.

Section 4(a)(1)(B) of the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act of 1965 (16 U.S.C. 460*l*-6a(a)(1)(B)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following sentence: "The Secretary shall make such a permit (to be known as the Grand Circle Adventure Passport) available for admission, for a period of at least 7 days, to the group of Arches National Park, Bryce Canyon National Park, Canyonlands National Park, Capitol Reef National Park, Zion National Park, Mesa Verde National Park, and Grand Canyon National Park (north rim), including admission to all monuments in those parks.".

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself, and Mr. PRYOR):

S. 2209. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to provide that small life insurance companies need not amortize acquisition expenses for purposes of the minimum tax; to the Committee on Finance.

TAX TREATMENT OF ACQUISITION EXPENSES

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today, along with the distinguished Senators from Oklahoma, Mr. BOREN, and from Arkansas, Mr. PRYOR, I am introducing legislation to remedy a serious problem created by an unfortunate provision of the corporate alternative minimum tax.

As part of the Tax Reform Act of 1986, we substantially revised and enhanced the alternative minimum tax. The goal was to assure that any corporation that had real income, paid some tax on that income. Unfortunately, in our zeal, we painted the tax law with too broad a brush. One of these overdrawn provisions now jeopardizes the financial stability of some of our most successfully small life insurance companies.

The provision to which I am referring is the requirement that, effective this year, life insurance companies must capitalize and amortize deferred acquisition costs. These costs consist primarily of commissions paid to agents for selling new policies. Standard practice in the industry is to pay substantial commissions out of premiums received in the year a policy is first sold. This means that a company will often have little or no premium income in the year it signs up a new policyholder. In practical effect, the premium goes to the agent, not the company.

Amortization of these costs for minimum tax purposes means that a life insurance company pays tax on income it does not really have. That is why for regular tax purposes and, until this year, for minimum tax purposes as well, insurance companies deduct these costs currently.

For large, older life insurance companies the amortization of acquisition costs really does not mean too much, other than a certain amount of increased tax in the short run. This is because new business represents a relatively small part of a large company's book of business.

However, for a younger, rapidly growing small company, the change that went into effect this year can be devastating. It goes to the heart of their ability to do business because it taxes away capital, not profits.

The ability of a life insurance company to do business is regulated by the insurance departments in the States in which it does business. In order to write new policies, such a company is required by State insurance laws to maintain adequate levels of surplus—that is, paid-in capital and retained earnings—over and above the amounts necessary to meet obligations under existing policies. The smaller the statutory surplus, the smaller the amount of new business that they are allowed to write.

In contrast to the giant life insurance companies with a large book of existing business, startup and other smaller companies which have found a niche in which they are successful, are severely penalized for the success that they have earned in the marketplace. This is because the increased tax directly reduces a company's statutory surplus. A small company which has a high percentage of new business compared to existing policies will have a very severe reduction in its surplus and corresponding reduction in its ability to continue to sell new policies.

I am aware of cases where companies will have their surplus reduced by as much as 40 or 50 percent, and I would be surprised if there are not companies with situations which are even more dire.

For this reason, I am introducing legislation which will exempt rapidly growing small life insurance companies from the requirement to capitalize and amortize acquisition costs. In order for a company to qualify for this exemption, it will have to meet a threshold of increasing growth by showing that it had an increase in business of more than 5 percent over the preceding year. This growth requirement will ensure that the relief will be targeted to precisely the companies who will be most severely affected by the capitalization and amortization requirements of existing law.

I should point out that this exemption will, by its nature, provide only temporary relief to any company since, as a company builds its book of existing business, it will eventually no longer be able to meet the 5 percent growth test. Thus, once again, we have assured that the relief is targeted only to those companies who otherwise will run substantial risk of problems with the State insurance regulators caused solely by our inadvertent error in the Tax Reform Act of 1986.

Mr. President, this is a reasonable response to a very severe, practical problem. I am confident that if we knew the facts in 1986, we would have provided relief at that time. It is imperative that we correct this problem at the earliest possible time this year.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2209

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. MINIMUM TAX TREATMENT OF ACQUISITION EXPENSES OF SMALL LIFE INSURANCE EXPENSES.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subparagraph (F) of section 56(g)(4) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended to read as follows:

"(F) ACQUISITION EXPENSES OF LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES.—

"(i) IN GENERAL.—Acquisition expenses of life insurance companies other than small life insurance companies shall be capitalized and amortized in accordance with the treatment generally required under generally accepted accounting principles as if this subparagraph applied to all taxable years.

"(ii) SMALL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.—For purposes of clause (i), a life insurance company shall be treated as a small life insurance company for a taxable year if—

"(I) a deduction is allowable to such company under section 806 for such taxable year (determined without regard to section 806(c)(2)), and

"(II) the amount determined under section 803(a)(1) with respect to such company for the taxable year exceeds by at least 5 percent the amount determined under such section for the preceding taxable year."

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by this section shall apply to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1989.●

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself and Mr. MOYNIHAN):

S. 2210. A bill to provide for preservation of competitive rail freight service routes in the Northeastern United States; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

COMPETITIVE NORTHEASTERN RAIL FREIGHT SERVICE ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, last week I took to the Senate floor to describe the need for continued operation of the Delaware & Hudson Railroad. Today, I join with my colleague Senator MOYNIHAN in introducing a bill that protects the future of the D&H.

My legislation, which is being introduced in the House by Congressman LENT, and other members of the New York and Pennsylvania delegations, addresses an issue that had brought efforts to sell the bankrupt D&H to a grinding halt. That issue is vital trackage rights over a route owned by the Consolidated Rail Corp. [Conrail] between Harrisburg, PA, and Hagerstown, MD. Without these trackage rights the D&H lacks a commercially viable north-south route to compete with the giant Conrail system.

The D&H is now under a trustee's protection. He is attempting to sell the railroad as a going concern, without breaking it up in liquidation. To attract a strong bidder, the D&H must be able to show that it can be operated at a profit. The trustee had accepted a bid that was conditioned on reaching an agreement with Conrail refuse to make a commercially reasonable bargain, and the bid was withdrawn. There is every indication that the bid would be resubmitted—and perhaps others would be made—if Conrail would change its position.

I along with other elected officials have written and spoken to Conrail officials regarding the D&H's need for these trackage rights. We have been met with intransigence. I am convinced that Conrail is simply waiting for the clock to run out on the trustee's ability to keep the D&H operating so that it will be dismantled in liquidation, removing any threat of future competition in the Northeast. I dislike the idea of Federal involvement in private business dealings, however, there are compelling public policy concerns here that cannot be ignored. Our failure to act would advance Conrail's clear plan to have a monopoly over rail freight in the Northeast.

The legislation I am introducing would enable the Interstate Commerce Commission [ICC] to ensure that there are at least two competitive single carrier rail freight routes from points in New York State permitting access to Montreal, Quebec, from Hagerstown, MD, and from Harrisburg PA, to Potomac Yard, VA. If the parties cannot agrees on the terms and conditions of new trackage rights necessary to create competition, then the ICC shall use procedures available to it to fix compensation for these rights.

The D&H Railroad began operations in 1867 and is the Nation's oldest continually operated railroad. Congress created Conrail out of the bankrupt wreckage of a half-dozen or so railroads in the midseventies, and gave the D&H trackage rights over it to provide competition for Conrail. These rights vastly extended the original D&H system, stretching the small regional railroad to 1,830 miles. Meanwhile Congress pumped $7 billion into Conrail, exempting it from strict Federal regulation including environmental and antitrust laws, until it was sold—as a strong profit producing business—at a public stock offering in 1987.

In retrospect, the original trackage rights provided to the D&H were deficient and did not enable it to provide strong competition to Conrail. Over the years the financial position of the D&H continually declined. If it is not now purchased by a strong railroad operator, with access to strategic trackage rights, it will never be a competitor to Conrail. The D&H was intended to be a viable competitor to Conrail. The D&H was intended to be a viable competitor to Conrail—not just a small regional shortline—but first we must solve some of the most basic problems with its route structure.

The urgency of the situation is clear. Without rapid action on this legislation, the D&H Railroad is likely to be broken up and Conrail will have a monopoly in the region. I urge my colleagues to support this important bill and press for its early passage.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2210

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Competitive Northeastern Rail Freight Service Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the current arrangements for the provision of competitive rail freight service in and across the Northeast region of the United States is threatened by the imminent collapse and liquidation of the bankrupt Delaware & Hudson Railway;

(2) the critical deficiency preventing the bankrupt rail carrier or any successor from providing effective rail competition in the region is the lack of competitive routes and interchange arrangements between the bankrupt carrier and the major rail carriers serving the South and Southeast;

(3) the lack of adequate southern connections for the bankrupt rail carrier is a direct consequence of uncorrected flaws in the Final System Plan that established the route system of the Consolidated Rail Corporation;

(4) adequate southern connections must be guaranteed for the Delaware & Hudson Railway or any successor in order to allow the functioning of competitive market forces in the Northeastern rail transportation market, as intended by the Regional Rail Reorganization Act of 1973, the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976, the Staggers Rail Act of 1980, and the Conrail Privatization Act; and

(5) the threatened collapse of rail competition in the Northeast region of the United States uniquely warrants Federal intervention to avoid conferring unintended monopoly power on the successfully privatized Consolidated Rail Corporation, such power being incompatible with the goals and purposes of the Federal laws and Federal funds that made such privatization possible.

SEC. 3. COMPETITIVE ROUTES FOR NORTHEAST RAIL FREIGHT SERVICE.

(a) ESTABLISHMENT OF ROUTES.—No later than 5 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall provide for access by a second, competitive rail freight carrier over routes from Montreal, Quebec, through the State of New York, via Harrisburg, Pennsylvania—

(1) to Hagerstown, Maryland; and

(2) to Potomac Yard, Alexandria, Virginia.

(b) REQUIREMENTS.—In establishing competitive routes pursuant to subsection (a), the Interstate Commerce Commission shall—

(1) utilize where practicable trackage rights arrangements existing as of the date of enactment of this Act, including the terms and conditions thereof;

(2) provide access to yards and the right to interchange traffic with connecting carriers at Binghamton, New York, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, Shippensburg, Pennsylvania, and Hagerstown, Maryland;

(3) grant trackage rights needed for the effectuation of the competitive routes in perpetuity; and

(4) ensure that the routes are designed to offer, and are suitable for, competitive rail freight service.

(c) COMPULSORY TRACKAGE RIGHTS.—If new trackage rights not existing on the date of enactment of this Act are considered necessary by the Interstate Commerce Commission to establish the competitive routes required by subsection (a), and if the parties necessary to implement the trackage rights cannot agree on the terms and conditions thereof by the end of the 5-day period specified in subsection (a), the Interstate Commerce Commission shall grant the necessary trackage rights within 15 days after the expiration of that period, and shall simultaneously establish terms and conditions for such trackage rights under the principle controlling compensation in condemnation proceedings. Such terms and conditions shall be subject to the requirements specified in subsection (b).●

S. CON. RES. 97

Whereas the emergence of popular anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union is of great concern to the United States;

Whereas on January 18, 1990, a Moscow writers' meeting was disrupted by a group of individuals shouting anti-Semitic statements;

Whereas many Soviet Jews live in fear of violence, intimidation, and harassment;

Whereas the Anti-Defamation League conducted an 11-day investigation into anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union, and has concluded that the situation poses a serious threat to the Soviet Jewish community; and

Whereas the Soviet Government has not responded forcefully to the rise in popular anti-Semitism: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the President of the United States should urge President Gorbachev of the Soviet Union to—

(1) publicly condemn the emergence of popular anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union; and

(2) take whatever measures are necessary to protect Soviet Jews from acts of harassment and violence.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as we all know, there has been an upsurge of anti-Semitism in various parts of the Soviet Union, to the extent that the Jewish population has begun to live in fear of direct physical violence. For once, it does not appear that this is the work of the Soviet government. On the contrary, anti-Semitism is now being used by political opponents of President Gorbachev's reform policies. Moreover, Soviet authorities are reported to have launched an investigation into some of the threats that have been leveled against Jews, which hopefully will lead to prosecution.

It is a supreme irony that glasnost and perestroika should have released some of the darkest forces of Soviet society. But it is indisputable that this is a byproduct of the greater latitude for political expression which now exists in the U.S.S.R. The kinds of threats which are now being made against Jews, however, goes far beyond anyone's concept of political expression, much less political free expression. These are threats against the safety and even the lives of Soviet Jews. These are threats that need to be taken seriously, lest they one day materialize.

It does not matter to us whether anti-Semitism is the product of official state propaganda, as it was in the past, or the product of the far right wing in the Soviet Union's new political spectrum. It is vicious in either case. And we need to oppose it in either case. Let no one tell us that the existence of venemous hatreds of this sort is an internal matter. We know better. History teaches us better. Great nations that believe they have something to offer the moral development of the world must expect that others will measure the quality of their daily life, not the quality of their propaganda.

Therefore, I am introducing today the Senate version of a resolution known in the House of Representatives as House Concurrent Resolution 264, expressing the sense of the Congress with respect to popular anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union. It deserves to be read in full on the floor of this Chamber, and since it is also short and to the point, I ask your indulgence for me to do so.

Whereas the emergence of popular anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union is of great concern to the United States;

Whereas the more than 2,000,000 Soviet Jews constitute the third largest Jewish community in the world;

Whereas throughout the Soviet Union, anti-Semitic sentiment, including demonstrations by Pamyat, a nationalist anti-Semitic organization, statements by electoral candidates, threatening phone calls and letters, and harassment of Jews, is becoming commonplace in certain Soviet cities;

Whereas on January 18, 1990, a Moscow writers' meeting was disrupted by a group of individuals shouting anti-Semitic statements;

Whereas many Soviet Jews live in fear of violence, intimidation, and harassment;

Whereas the Anti-Defamation League conducted an 11-day investigation into anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union, and has concluded that the situation poses a serious threat to the Soviet Jewish community; and

Whereas the Soviet Government has not responded forcefully to the rise in popular anti-Semitism: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that the President of the United States should urge President Gorbachev of the Soviet Union to—

(1) publicly condemn the emergence of popular anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union; and

(2) take whatever measures are necessary to protect Soviet Jews from acts of harassment and violence.

Mr. President, I am pleased that Senator PELL joins me as an original cosponsor of this Senate concurrent resolution, along with Senators D'AMATO and PRESSLER. This resolution is the beginning of what I trust will be shortly the strongest possible expression of support from both sides of the aisle for the proposition that we should forcefully condemn the emergence of popular anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union. The signs are truly disturbing and we cannot stand back and just ignore this situation. History teaches us the folly of that course of action.

Mr. President, one other matter before I conclude.

After the disruption of the Soviet writers' meeting in the Soviet Union on January 18, the Soviet poet Yevtushenko, a legendary poet of conscience, wrote a declaration against racism which was inspired by the events he witnessed in the disruption of the writers' meeting. I brought it back from Moscow, had it translated by the Congressional Research Service into English, and I would like to put it into the RECORD. Let me just read one short passage from this. This declaration was signed by some 700 writers in the Soviet Union:

It happened in Moscow on January 18th, in the Central House of Writers. The "April" writers group had planned a meeting. However, two hours before the meeting, a group of people with no connection to literature spread through the hall (there were roughly 50 people, the majority were wearing George the Victorious on their breasts). They carried megaphones and put on an anti-perestroika chauvinist witch hunt. They provoked a fight. Their Black Hundreds shouts and physical anti-rights acts insulted the writers, who included USSR deputies. They waved antisemitic slogans, and threatened to start a pogrom against the Jews. These latter-day nazis shouted, "Lousy yids! Beat it to your Israel!" to everyone present, whether they were Jews or not. Their pathological racist hatred brought them to a state where any non-antisemite seemed like a Jew to them.

He goes on to talk about how several of the writers, including elderly women, were physically attacked and roughed up by these Nazi-like intruders. Of course, the news reports and analyses coming from the Soviet Union are filled with accounts that are not dissimilar from this. Given the history of this problem and given the conditions of uncertainty now present in the Soviet Union, I truly feel it is an important matter for this body to go forcefully on record as calling for the steps contained in this Senate concurrent resolution.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of this declaration against racism from the Soviet writers be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the declaration was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A DECLARATION AGAINST RACISM

An aversion to the word "racism" has been instilled in us since childhood. We have always perceived it as something remote from us, something foreign and capitalist. The older ones among us remember the little black boy who is saved from an American racist and carefully passed from hand to hand in the film "Circus."

Our Constitution legislatively condemns arousing hatred among peoples. We saw one of the brutish faces of racism during the Second World War, which was won by all the people of our nation. Later we saw another face of racism, this time our own indigenous kind: state genocide against entire nationalities, the Kalmyks, Checheno-Ingushch, and Crimean Tatars; the murder of the great Jewish actor Mikhoels, the destruction of the so-called Cosmopolitans in 1949, and the case of the "doctor poisoners" in 1953, monstrous antisemitic satires in newspapers. At first, it seemed like all of this would never happen again after Stalin's death. We were truly indignant at the American Ku Klux Klan, the Bartholomew Nights in Ireland, and the endless blood-letting in the Middle East.

However, like SPEED, racism recognizes no borders. The microbes of racism developed marvelously in the culture medium of stagnation and in cadre politics, where question number five in the questionnaire acquired such tragic significance. Recently, we shook with indignation and shame as we witnessed flashes of a raging epidemic of racism on our own streets, or in the next city, or in a distant Soviet republic.

It happened in Moscow on January 18th, in the Central House of Writers. The "April" writers group had planned a meeting. However, two hours before the meeting, a group of people with no connection to literature spread through the hall (there were roughly 50 people, the majority were wearing George the Victorious on their breasts). They carried megaphones and put on an anti-perestroika chauvinist witch hunt. They provoked a fight. Their Black Hundreds shouts and physical anti-rights acts insulted the writers, who included USSR deputies. They waved antisemitic slogans, and threatened to start a pogrom against the Jews. These latter-day Nazis shouted, "Lousy yids! Beat it to your Israel!" to everyone present, whether they were Jews or not. Their pathological racist hatred brought them to a state where any non-antisemite seemed like a Jew to them. For example, how else can one interpret the slogan "A.N. Yakovlev, Beat it to Tel Aviv!"? Several husky fellows savagely beat the famous Russian writer Anatoly Kurchatkin, who had tried to calm them down.

They broke his glasses and injured his eye. They struck Yelizar Maltsev, who is one of our oldest prose writers. In their debauch, these unrestrained toughs of Russian naziism went so far as to even attack women writers, despite the advanced age of some of them. It took the help of a reinforced police detail, which was late in arriving, to remove the vandals from the hall. A number of the instigators slipped through police fingers in some unknown fashion. One thing is clear. That scandal was no random occurrence, but a planned demonstration. This leads me to believe that extremists from the "Pamyat" society and organizations associated with it are banking on disorders, in the hope that they will lead to an imperial, militarized dictatorship.

One of the most dangerous forms of organized criminality today is racism. Racism is a speculative imitation of the struggle for national interests. In reality, racism is an instrument for manipulating the people for the career goals of a narrow reactionary group.

Naturally we draw a connection between the witch hunt in our writer's club and the antisemitic tone of the last plenum of the RSFSR Writers Union. It, in turn, coincided with a gathering of the same sort, which was organized on Red Square by "Pamyat." These and other related demonstrations in Moscow and Leningrad are being reinforced by a constant ideological artillery preparation in a number of articles with a clearly racist aftertaste. They are being published in "Molodaya Gvardiya," "Nash Sovremennik," "Leningradskaya Pravda," "Moskovsky Literator" and other publications. We are saddened and shocked by the position of certain famous writers on the editorial staffs of these publications. At times they not only passively permit the use of their names, but also openly support racist tendencies. I would like to remind these writers that a transition to reactionary positions usually ends in artistic sterility. An association with racism has never yet given birth to a single great writer, but it has discredited many.

We angrily and contemptuously condemn all forms of nationalism and chauvinism, including antisemitism. It was said before in a previous "April" declaration that, "there will be no united front of Russian chauvinism" on the nationality issue. Right now, in this heated situation, we say this: there is and will be a united, steadfast front against chauvinism and any violence, no matter what national flag shrouds it. We call upon all the citizens of our nation to close ranks in a united front: the working class, which has lost its sense of proletarian solidarity, and the intelligentsia, which has not forgotten its humanitarian function.

Our consciences are troubled by the victims of the carnage in Baku, Sumgait, Fergana and Uzen, the Azerbaijani refugees from Armenia and the Armenian refugees from Azerbaijan; the Turkimeskhtins, who have shed their native blood; the residents of Nagorno-Karabakh, where shots ring out night and day; peaceful Volga Germans, who for some reason are paying for the crimes of Fascism; and Crimean Tatars, whose small tent towns are furtively set ablaze when they return to the land of their forefathers.

Imperial thinking should be foreign to us, for the law of history is clear: in the end, all empires fall apart. Yet, we are against the disintegration of interracial and human relations. We are for the free union of free, sovereign peoples. We must also protect the right of the Baltic peoples to a sovereign development path, and the right of the Russian people, and any other nationality living in the Baltic region, to not lose faith in tomorrow.

We are against the violent usurpation of the right to consider only one point of view correct in the highest instance, for that is a form of ideological racism. We are against just one religion considering itself God's representative and calling for war against other religion and believers, for that is religious racism. Enough fire and blood! Enough distrust, mutual accusations and reproaches which reach the point of deadlocked mutual resentment.

Enough national egoism, enough of any racial narrow-mindedness!" Let's look one another in the eye. Don't we share the same problems? Are intellect and conscience identified through a blood analysis?

With bitterness and pain, we see all around us racism which is not imported, but home-grown and indigenous. Surely we are not headed for a new, gigantic, genocidal civil war. After all, no one knows better than we that civil war is primarily fratricide.

We believe in the inner potential of each individual people in our nation and of all of its peoples together. We are for democratic pluralism, but not for pandering to Fascism. No other name exists for hate propaganda toward other peoples. We demand that our government finally begin applying every effort against pogrom organizers who try to take advantage of democracy only in order to smother it.

"APRIL."

[Note.—"April" is an organization which has existed for a year and a half. It includes 620 writers.]

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from Tennessee in cosponsoring this concurrent resolution on anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union. Over the last year we have witnessed remarkable and unforeseeable changes in the Soviet Union. The liberalization of Soviet society, which we all welcome, has been accompanied by a disturbing rise in anti-Semitism among the populace.

Nationalist anti-Semitic organizations such a Pamyat are now operating openly and freely in the Soviet Union. Although initially founded to help preserve and secure traditional Russian historical and cultural monuments, Pamyat has become a chauvinistic Russian organization which openly expresses hatred of Jews and blames all problems in the Soviet Union on the Jews. Anti-Semitic statements by public officials and harassment and intimidation of Jews by their neighbors are increasing.

The revival of traditional Russian anti-Semitism is a dangerous development. It threatens the lives and culture of Jews in the Soviet Union, and it subverts President Gorbachev's policies of glasnost and perestroika. As a nation committed to fundamental rights and freedoms, we must do all that we can to expose this growing anti-Semitism.

The concurrent resolution which we have introduced today will do that. It calls upon the President to urge President Gorbachev to condemn publicly anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union and to take whatever steps are necessary to protect Soviet Jews from harassment and violence. This is an important concurrent resolution and I will do all that I can to move it quickly through the Foreign Relations Committee.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 98—AUTHORIZING A PUBLIC EVENT FOR EARTH DAY 1990 ON THE CAPITOL GROUNDS

Mr. LEVIN (for Mr. GORE, for himself and Mr. HEINZ) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered and agreed to:

S. CON. RES. 98

Whereas Congress has adopted Public Law 101-186 designating April 22, 1990, as "Earth Day";' to promote the preservation of the environment;

Whereas the President has proclaimed his support for Earth Day 1990 and called on the people of the United States to observe the day with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities designed to promote greater understanding of ecological issues; and

Whereas Earth Day 1990 has expressed an interest in organizing a public event with musical entertainment to promote environmental awareness and environmentally responsible behavior; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That Earth Day 1990 shall be permitted to sponsor a public event with musical entertainment on the United States Capitol Grounds on April 22, 1990. This event shall be free to the public and arranged not to interfere with the needs of Congress, under conditions to be provided by the Architect of the Capitol and the Capitol Police Board. For the purpose of this resolution, the promoters of Earth Day 1990 are authorized to erect upon the United States Capitol Grounds, subject to the approval of the Architect of the Capitol, such stage, sound amplification devices, and other related structures and equipment, as may be required for the event and are authorized to make any arrangements that may be required to carry out the event.

SENATE RESOLUTION 252—RELATING TO THE SOVIET REFUSAL TO IMPLEMENT THE COMMERCIAL AIR AGREEMENT BETWEEN EL AL AND AEROFLOT AIRLINES

Mr. SPECTER (for himself, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BURNS, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. KASTEN, and Mr. SYMMS) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 252

Whereas the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, section 402 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2432, Title IV, Section 402, Jan. 3, 1975, 88 Stat. 2056; Pub. L. 96-39, Title XI, Section 1106(f)(1), July 26, 1979, 93 Stat. 312), prohibits the extending of Most Favored Nation tariff status to any nonmarket country that denies its citizens the right or opportunity to emigrate;

Whereas the provisions of the Jackson-Vanik Amendment currently apply to the Soviet Union;

Whereas the United States currently is involved in negotiations aimed at reaching a comprehensive trade agreeement with the Soviet Union;

Whereas the Soviet airline Aeroflot entered into a commercial airline agreement with the Israeli airline El Al in December 1989 which would give El Al the right to have direct airline flights between the Soviet Union and Israel;

Whereas the direct airline flights as agreed to would facilitate the transport of Soviet Jews to Israel;

Whereas on February 5, 1990, the United States Senate sent a letter to Soviet President Gorbachev signed by all 100 Senators urging the implementation of the commercial airline agreement between the Soviet Union and Israel.

Whereas the Arab nations have applied intense diplomatic pressure on the Soviet Union to prevent the implementation of the direct flights for fear of increased settlements on the West Bank but conclusive evidence shows fewer than two per cent of Soviet emigres to Israel settle on the West Bank;

Whereas the Soviet Union refuses to allow Aeroflot to comply with the terms regarding implementation of the commercial airline agreement;

Whereas the United States has continued its support for free emigration of Soviet Jews especially in light of the recent rise in incidents of virulent anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union in the past year culminating with threats of pogroms on May 5, 1990; Therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the Sense of the Senate that the United States should not complete trade negotiations with the Soviet Union until the Soviet Union complies with the agreement to allow El Al the right to have direct airline flights between the Soviet Union and Israel; and therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the Sense of the Senate that the Senate will not approve a waiver of the Jackson-Vanik Amendment to implement any trade agreement unless and until the Soviet Union implements the commercial airline agreement between Aeroflot and El Al airlines.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, as I had said, I had intended to offer an amendment, having given notice to Senator KENNEDY yesterday of my intention to do so, which is not directly related to the bill, S. 1430, but in accordance with the rules of the Senate would be appropriate. I have since decided to file the resolution and not offer it at this time to give others an opportunity to consider the resolution. I will see what their responses may be, with my intention perhaps to offer it later today and call for a vote on it perhaps tomorrow.

Mr. President, I send this resolution to the desk and ask that it be filed at this time.

The resolution, Mr. President, would tell the Soviet Union that the United States will not grant the Soviet Union most-favored-nation status under Jackson-Vanik unless the Soviet Union honors the agreement between El Al and Aeroflot to transport Soviet Jews to Israel.

This resolution is based on two fundamental propositions. First, Jackson-Vanik conditions most-favored-nation status on the right to emigrate and, second, the United States should not make concessionary agreements with the Soviet Union where the Soviet Union is in breach of its contract to honor its firm commitments on the El Al-Aeroflot agreement to transport Soviet Jews to Israel.

Mr. President, the provisions of Jackson-Vanik are plain as set forth in 19 United States Code 2432: "To assure the continued dedication of the United States to fundamental human rights", and then continuing, that a nation shall "Not be eligible" to receive "most-favored-nation treatment" where "there is a denial of its citizens of the right and opportunity to emigrate."

Mr. President, I believe that at the present time there is that denial because there are Jews in the Soviet Union who hold visas permitting them to leave the Soviet Union and to enter Israel. Since they have airline tickets 10 months away or so, they are in effect, being denied the right to emigrate. This is a very fundamental breach because, given what is happening in the Soviet Union today, there is considerable evidence of virulent antisemitism. There is considerable talk about massive pogroms of Jews on May 5 and it is a matter of the utmost urgency. It is sufficiently urgent, Mr. President, that when a letter was circulated calling for President Gorbachev to implement this agreement—because of the Soviet Government refusal to allow Aeroflot and El Al to carry out the agreement to have El Al flights come to the Soviet Union—a letter was circulated and received signatures of 100 United States Senators. My inquiries have failed to disclose any recollection of 100 Senators having signed this kind of a letter in the past.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this point that the full text of the letter appear following my presentation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, there is concern in some quarters that tying the issue of Jackson-Vanik to the El Al flights may be a considerable problem for the current leadership of the Soviet Union to President Gorbachev. But this matter, Mr. President, has been an item of top-level negotiation. It was on the agenda when Secretary of State Baker spoke to Foreign Minister Shevardnadze, and when Secretary of State Baker met directly with President Gorbachev. So it has been called to the attention of officials in the highest level; the President and Foreign Minister of the Soviet Union.

So when I consider the filing of this resolution it is not hasty and it is not inconsequential and it is a matter where many lives are at stake.

Mr. President, if the Senate must choose, or if I must choose between the welfare of President Gorbachev and the welfare of the Soviet Jews, I must come down with the decision to utilize what a Senator may do or what the United States Senate may do on the side of Soviet Jewry.

Mr. President, I speak with some considerable personal conviction because my father was a Russian Jew and came to the United States in 1911 before there was a Soviet Union. My mother came from part of Russo-Poland—it depended on what day it was, whether it was in Russia or whether it was in Poland—in 1905 at the age of 5. And notwithstanding the passage of many years, my ears still ring with my father's comments about the anti-Semitism in his small town Bachkerina in the Ukraine when he was a boy growing up in 1900 or 1, 2, 3, 4, until he made up his mind with barely a ruble in his pocket to leave Russia to come to the United States in 1911. He talked about the pogroms in Russia and talked about the vile treatment of the Cossacks against the Jews.

At a time when this ugly face of antisemitism is being reared and there is virulent antisemitism in many parts of the Soviet Union—there is active talk about pogroms on May 5 of this year—it is my view that this Senator and the United States Senate and the United States Government should do all that it can within its power to take forceful action to allow Jews to leave the Soviet Union.

Where you have an agreement which has been entered into between Aeroflot and El Al on this subject, a binding contract, and the Soviet Union is interfering with its enforcement because of pressure from the Arab countries, the United States ought not to sit still.

Secretary of State Baker did carry this matter as I say, to Mr. Shevardnadze and to Mr. Gorbachev. But more can be done when you have on the face of Jackson-Vanik itself the statement: We will not give most-favored-nation treatment to a country that denies its citizens the right to emigrate, and that is what is happening when they cannot board El Al planes that would be provided for them. This is a matter of the utmost importance.

Mr. President, I would prefer not to have had to formulate this resolution had President Gorbachev acceded to the wishes of the letter signed by 100 U.S. Senators. It would still be my hope that this is a matter which can be negotiated so it is not necessary for this kind of pressure to be placed.

But this is the precise purpose for which Jackson-Vanik was enacted, and this is a specific important issue that Jackson-Vanik ought to be used in the context where the United States is negotiating with the Soviet Union for a major trade agreement. The President has stated his intention to make the Soviet Union a most favored nation. Where there are good reasons for the United States to be supportive of the Soviet Union nonetheless, with this very serious threat to Soviet Jewry it is my sense that this kind of resolution ought to be acted upon by the United States Senate if its objective cannot be obtained collaterally.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I would like to add that I have long supported close relations and negotiations and effort to improve the bilateral relationship between the United States and the Soviet Union. This Senator was the first Senator to press for a summit, having filed a resolution back in April 1982, calling on President Reagan to have a summit at that time with General Secretary Brezhnev, a resolution which was opposed very forcefully by the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Percy, and by the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator Tower. It passed the Senate. I renewed that resolution and pressed it in personal conversations with President Reagan.

So my record is clear on moving in a forceful way to try to improve relations with the Soviet Union and to be supportive of detente. And there are good reasons why the United States would move in the direction of the most-favored-nation status for the Soviet Union to strengthen glasnost and perestroika and the reforms which are being made in the Soviet Union at the present time.

Mr. President, yesterday one of my colleagues said to me that he had grave questions and tentative opposition to this resolution because it would weaken Gorbachev. I found a conclusive answer to that contention on the front page of the New York Times today which carries the headline at the top, "Gorbachev Forces Bill on Presidency Past Legislature," and a detailed statement as to Mr. Gorbachev's power and solidity today—much more power than is possessed by say Russian Jews in the Ukraine. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this article be provided following my statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. As I say, Mr. President, I do not intend to call this matter to a vote imminently, but I did want to file the resolution and state these considerations for the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair inquires of the Senator as to whether or not he would wish to change the form of the amendment which was proposed to have been offered to S. 1430 as a sense-of-the-Senate amendment. Does he propose to change that to the form of a resolution?

Mr. SPECTER. I had come to the floor early this morning intending to offer it as an amendment. But having revised my thinking, at least for the moment, I will change the form, and I thank the Chair for that suggestion.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, February 5, 1990.

His Excellency MIKHAIL GORBACHEV,
President, Supreme Soviet, The Kremlin.

DEAR PRESIDENT GORBACHEV: Noting the historic concern of the American people regarding the compelling plight of Soviet Jews, we are writing at this time to request that prompt action be taken to implement the agreement between Aeroflot and El Al Airlines to transport Soviet Jews to Israel.

This laudable agreement was signed in Moscow on December 6, 1989, with the "intention to advance air transport and aerial services between the two parties, between Soviet and Israeli points directly." Implementation was scheduled to begin on January 1, 1990, but as of this day, no actions related to the agreement have been taken.

It is our understanding that all aspects of authorization for the Soviet Jewish emigres to leave for Israel already have been arranged. We understand that these emigres have their exit visas from the USSR and their entrance visas to Israel in hand as well as airplane tickets. It is, of course, extremely difficult for such individuals who are very anxious and concerned about their future.

We have been assured that these Soviet Jewish emigres have the money for transit from either private or public sources and that Israel is prepared to receive them. We are advised that two, or perhaps even more, 747 flights per day can be arranged once the signed agreement between Aeroflot and El Al is implemented.

To accomplish this humanitarian purpose, we urge you to take whatever action is appropriate to have the agreement implemented. We are advised that the El Al mission that conducted the negotiations was informed that approval for implementation must come from the "political level" of the Soviet Union. When Foreign Minister Shevardnadze met with Israeli Foreign Minister Moshe Arens preceding the signing of the agreement, however, Mr. Shevardnadze offered that this was strictly a commercial rather than a political issue. In either case, we ask that you assist in removing whatever obstacles currently exist so that the flight may begin.

Thank you for your personal attention to this important matter.

Sincerely,

GORBACHEV FORCES BILL ON PRESIDENCY PAST LEGISLATURE—DRIVE TO EXPAND POWERS—FINAL ACTION COULD BE TAKEN AT CONGRESSIONAL SESSION IN TWO WEEKS' TIME

(By Francis X. Clines)

Moscow, February 27.—Under fierce prodding from President Mikhail S. Gorbachev, the Supreme Soviet gave initial approval today to his proposal to secure greater executive powers through the institution of a popularly elected presidency.

In an angry, intense session that culminated in a virtuoso display of Mr. Gorbachev's power to dominate the legislative process, the Supreme Soviet, the standing Parliament, yielded to the hard-driving leader and sent the emergency proposal on to the Congress making a law.

"Calm down, calm down, calm down," Mr. Gorbachev said, glaring around the Kremlin hall as he took over the microphone for a long, obviously heartfelt denunciation of the chamber's nascent opposition minority and its often stinging criticism of the proposal.

NEXT STEP MARCH 12 AND 13

"Life itself dictates quick action on this matter," he said, closing off debate in a chairman's flat that soon produced a vote of 306 to 65 to send the proposal on to the 2,250-member Congress of People's Deputies, the final step in the legislative process. Mr. Gorbachev scheduled an emergency session of the Congress for March 12 and 13.

"People who are opposed to this proposal are trying to sow distrust," he said, his voice steeled by exasperation at criticism of the plan as too close to the nation's totalitarian history to be dealt with in such haste.

Anatoly A. Sobchak, a leading opposition deputy who warned that the proposal was far from ready for a vote, said, "We are not talking about electing some all-union gendarme. We are talking about a president."

The measure was proposed by Mr. Gorbachev in tandem with his recent concession that the Communist Party might consider yielding its constitutional monopoly on power.

The plan would institute a popularly elected president with a five-year term—but only after a transition period of four years, during which Mr. Gorbachev would seem quite likely to keep the post by winning selection by the national Congress.

In addition to being commander in chief and chief of state, the new president would have the power to declare a state of emergency and martial law in any troubled area.

"If the law is adopted in its present form, the president can do almost everything," said Sergei B. Stankevich. "We can still feel the great totalitarian tradition in this country."

Mr. Gorbachev argued that modern needs required a stronger executive, but not, he promised, of the sort represented by his more notorious predecessors such as Stalin.

Mr. Gorbachev and supporters of the new presidency plan say that the parliamentary system introduced last year gives Mr. Gorbachev insufficient power, because he must consult with the Supreme Soviet or, in emergencies, with its ruling Presidium before acting—slowing him down in dealing with ethnic or economic crises.

He agreed that the crisis-ridden nation might need a stronger executive system but he stressed that it must be cast with careful regard for checks and balances.

One deputy, alarmed at the sudden display of executive power that curtailed the debate, took to a floor microphone to complain, "The way the vote was carried out today is an indication of what executive presidential power will be."

Another deputy, Vladimir I. Denisov warned the lawmakers that under the president could easily turn into a kind of eastern despotism."

ABSENCE OF CHECKS AND BALANCES

While the broader executive powers might seem comparable ot those of such democracies as the United States, Mr. Denisov said, there was no other established center of power to provide the checks and balances of the American system.

The new legislature, Mr. Denisov said, is already "a shop that is dying," and the judiciary is riddled with party appointees. He drew widespread laughter of agreement in arguing, "No supreme court judge in this country would dream of judging against him in his worst nightmare."

Before Mr. Gorbachev signaled the Communist Party loyalists of the majority that he wanted fast approval, various deputies sought speaking time to raise questions about the measure. In particular they wondered how it would fit into Mr. Gorbachev's earlier plans to decentralize authority, taking it away from the Kremlin and giving it to the nation's republics and local goverments.

After hearing Mr. Gorbachev and other proponents reply that any legislative delay would only compound the national crisis, one deputy, Tengiz P. Buachidze, turned to Mr. Gorbachev and pleaded, "Equal to equal, human to human, please make clear to us what the rights of the republics are."

Mr. Gorbachev, who only six months ago was defending the one-party monopoly of government and dismission a Western-style executive system as alien to national tradition, said he had had this "third stage" of political reform in mind for some time.

The nation's crisis was so pressing, longer be measured as a matter of "years or even months."

He asked rhetorically whether he should resign now because, as he heatedly noted, "we are now dealing with an open opposition" willing to question his motives.

"That is a wild thought," he said, dismissing the notion as he pushed the majority to deliver the vote.

NO WISH TO UNSEAT GORBACHEV

A number of critics conceded that a more effective executive system was badly needed, and even as they said the proposed executive was far too powerful to be approved in haste, many of them implicitly acknowledged they had no wish to unseat Mr. Gorbachev, who is widely perceived as the nation's indispensable emergency leader.

"What does Gorbachev have to do with it?" he asked the lawmakers, disowning a dictator's appetite but saying he would be guilty of cowardice if he did not seek the widespread elected authority he says he needs to deal with such problems as rebellion and ethnic violence in some republics.

"Life has brought us to this point, nothing else," he prodded the lawmakers. "We must make a decision."

Such critics as Yuri Boldyrev, a deputy from Leningrad, focused on the increased powers of legislative veto the new president would have and pleaded with the chamber not to continue the Soviet "illusion that our problems can be solved by increasing central authority."

Mr. Gorbachev denounced this as "cheap demagoguery."

"Comrades, you will be ashamed of other deputy said the urgency was too reminiscent of the founding Bolsheviks: "The comrades back then were in a hurry, too."

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED

NATIONAL AND COMMUNITY SERVICE ACT

McCONNELL (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 1269

Mr. McCONNELL (for himself, Mr. ARMSTRONG, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. COATS, Mr. GORTON, Mr. GRAMM, Mr. HATCH, Mr. LOTT, Mr. MACK, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. NICKLES, Mr. SYMMS, Mr. KASTEN, and Mr. WALLOP) proposed an amendment to the bill (S. 1430) to enhance national and community service, and for other purposes, as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new title:

SEC. 401. JOINT AND SEVERAL LIABILITY.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subsection (b), joint and several liability may not be applied to any civil liability action if one party is a tax-exempt organization described in sections 501(c) (1), (3), (4), (6), (7), (14) and (19) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986. A person found liable for damages in any such action may be found liable, if at all, only for those damages directly attributable to the person's pro rata share of fault or responsibility for the injury, and may not be found liable for damages attributable to the pro rata share of fault or responsibility of any other person (without regard to whether that person is a party to the action) for the injury, including any person bringing the action.

(b) EXCEPTION.—This section shall not apply as between persons acting in concert if the concerted action proximately caused the injury for which one or more persons are found liable for damages.

(c) DEFINITION.—As used in this section, the term "concerted action" or "acting in concert" means the participation in joint conduct by two or more persons who agreed to jointly participate in such conduct with actual knowledge of the wrongfulness of the conduct.

SEC. 402. ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION.

(a) POLICY.—Because the traditional litigation process is not always suited to the timely, efficient, and inexpensive resolution of civil actions, it is the policy of the United States to encourage the creation and use of alternative dispute resolution techniques, and to promote the expeditious resolution of such actions.

(b) ALTERNATIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION OPTIONS.—In any action in which one party is a tax-exempt organization described in sections 501(c) (1), (3), (4), (6), (7), (14) and (19) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986, each attorney who has made an appearance in the case and who represents one or more of the parties to the action shall, with respect to each party separately represented, advise the party of the existence and availability of alternative dispute resolution options, including extrajudicial proceedings such as minitrials, third-party mediation, court supervised arbitration, and summary jury trial proceedings.

(c) ADVISING CLIENTS OF OPTIONS.—Each attorney described in subsection (b) shall, simultaneous with the filing of a complaint or a responsive pleading, file notice with the court certifying that the attorney has so advised his client or clients, and indicating whether such client will agree to one or more of the alternative dispute resolution techniques.

(d) AGREEMENT TO ALTERNATIVE-DISPUTE RESOLUTION.—If all parties to an action described in subsection (a) agree to proceed with one or more alternative dispute resolution proceedings, the court shall issue an appropriate order governing the conduct of such proceedings. The issuance of an order governing such further proceedings shall constitute a waiver, by each party subject to the order, of the right to proceed further in court.

SEC. 403. NATIONAL GOOD SAMARITAN RULE.

(a) EXEMPTION FROM LIABILITY.—Except as provided in subsections (b) and (d), any volunteer of a tax-exempt organization described in sections 501(c) (1), (3), (4), (6), (7), (14) and (19) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 shall not be subject to liability for any tort claim alleging damage or injury from any act or omission of the volunteer on behalf of the organization if—

(1) such individual was acting in good faith and within the scope of such individual's volunteer functions and activities with the organization; and

(2) such damage or injury was not caused by willful, wanton or reckless misconduct by such individual.

(b) ACTIONS AGAINST VOLUNTEERS.—Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect any civil action brought by any such tax-exempt organization against any volunteer of such organization.

(c) INJURY TO A PERSON.—Nothing in this section shall be construed to affect the liability of any such tax-exempt organization with respect to injury caused to any person.

(d) EXCEPTION.—The protection from liability required by subsection (a) does not (1) apply if the volunteer was operating a motor vehicle or was operating a vessel, aircraft, or other vehicle for which a pilot's or other form of operator's license is required; or (2) the volunteer was performing an activity which is subject to federal or state professional license or certification.

GRAMM (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 1270

At the appropriate place in the bill, insert the following:

SEC. . POLICY REGARDING "PEACE DIVIDEND".

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) in recent months dramatic movements toward greater political and economic freedom have occurred in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union;

(2) these democratic reforms may permit the preservation of our Nation's security at a cost less than current budget projections;

(3) the changes in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union are a direct result of the American taxpayer's willingness and determination to pay the price for the advancement of freedom throughout the world;

(4) the changes in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union are also a direct result of the total inability of socialist economies to compete with free-market economies;

(5) the family has been the keystone of the ability of Western democracies to promote growth and opportunity; and

(6) the recent democratic reforms in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union have again demonstrated the need to redirect resources from government to the family to meet effectively individual needs of health, education, training, and nutrition.

(b) POLICY.—It is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) any savings resulting from lower defense expenditures below the level required for balanced fiscal restraint to meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit targets and to achieve a balanced budget excluding the Social Security Trust Fund should be returned to America's taxpayers;

(2) only by returning defense savings to American families to invest in their futures and, thus, America's future can the United States assure that the "peace dividend" will be wisely invested; and

(3) savings from the so-called "peace dividend" should be returned to the American taxpayer in the form of measures such as a refundable child care tax deduction, repeal of the Social Security earnings test, an increase in the personal exemption, expansion of a permanent research and development tax credit, a long-term capital gains tax cut, further lowering of marginal tax rates, and other savings and investment incentives.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that funds saved as a result of reductions in military expenditures shall be used for—

(1) balancing the budget, without resorting to use of the Social Security surpluses, in order to stop the ongoing "thievery" and "embezzlement" from the Social Security Trust Funds;

(2) urgent national priorities, including investing in America's future, anti-drug and anti-crime efforts, education, health care, the environment, rebuilding the infrastructure, assisting emerging democracies, and other critical needs;

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

TASTE OF THE NATION

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, across America, the following ritual is completed on a nightly basis. Americans, both young and old, will return home tonight after a long day of work or school, relax with their family and eat a satisfying home cooked meal.

Unfortunately Mr. President, for an increasing number of Americans this ritual is only a dream. Millions of Americans, including an alarming number of children, will go to sleep hungry tonight. Tragically, in our land of plenty this number has increased substantially over the past decade.

The combination of cuts at the Federal level, a decline in corporate donations, and the increasing number of homeless Americans have all contributed to a crisis situation in emergency food networks across the Nation. There simply are not enough resources to meet the increasing need.

Happily, I rise before my colleagues today to bring attention to the heroic efforts that the Nation's finest chefs and the internationally recognized Save Our Strength organization [SOS] are making an effort to raise money to be used in the fight against hunger both at home and abroad.

In cooperation with Bon Appetit magazine, SOS and chefs in over 70 cities are sponsoring a Taste of the Nation benefit on March 29. This benefit is expected to be the largest tasting event ever and raise over a million dollars in ticket sales. One-hundred percent of the money being raised will be distributed to fight hunger.

In Chicago, chefs Jackie Shen of Jackie's, and Martin Gagne of Cafe 21 in Hotel 21 East head a long list of internationally renowned chefs from 23 of Chicago's finest restaurants. The Chicago benefit will take place at Excalibur located at 632 North Dearborn Street. Proceeds will benefit the Greater Chicago Depository, the Eastern Illinois Food Bank, and international relief agencies.

I urge my colleagues to publicize this noteworthy event in their communities across the country. It will only be through efforts such as the Taste of the Nation benefit that the scourge of hunger will be driven from the United States.●

ALEX SMEKTA: ROCHESTER'S ELDER STATESMAN

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, our Founding Fathers once deemed adequate that each State should elect two Senators and a number of Representatives proportional to that State's population. A modern Senator, representing often more than 5 million people, needs the help of good staff, and the service of volunteers, to best serve his or her constituents.

Alex Smekta is a long time friend and staff member who spends hundreds of hours a year doing what he loves and does best. Alex is Rochester's elder statesman. With all the drive of a successful businessman, the charm of a politician and the wisdom of a favorite professor, the Honorable Alex Smekta—he served as Rochester's mayor for 17 years—keeps in touch with Minnesotans.

Listening to people, asking them questions about how the Government is serving, or in many cases aggravating them and seeking out their thoughts on controversial issues facing us here in Congress—those are all elements of Alex's week in southern Minnesota.

He doesn't limit himself to the farm fields and main streets of Minnesota's First and Second Congressional Districts, though. He ventures northward, usually visiting the Iron Range in north central Minnesota during midsummer. Visiting with government officials, business and farm people and fellow Kiwanians, Alex has reported back to me on a regular basis throughout my tenure in the Senate.

As the months and years of our busy lives go by, we often lose perspective of the tremendous work that is done by those not in our immediate presence. Alex was recently written up in the Rochester Post Bulletin, and reading that clip reminded me that he is a real treasure, invaluable to me and my staff.

I would like to submit Harold Severson's "Town and Country Scene" column to the RECORD at this time, as a tribute to a good friend of mine, and of all Minnesotans. As I continue to represent the concerns and interests of the people of Minnesota, I am proud to have Alex on my team.

The article follows:

[From the Rochester (MN) Post-Bulletin, Jan. 13, 1990]

EX-MAYOR WILL WEAR OUT BEFORE HE RUSTS OUT

(By Harold Severson)

What's the antithesis of wimpiness?

It's somebody like Alex Smekta, the one-time mayor of Rochester who came to America as a 3½-year-old Polish boy unable to speak a word of English.

He grew up to be an all-conference guard on a Mankato State College football team. Next he came to Rochester and served 17 years as its mayor. He became a president of Toastmasters International, he met scores of celebrities, he conducted himself with dignity and charm, he operated a successful business.

In short, he was the Lech Walesa of Minnesota. A brainy, resourceful, don't-push-me-around type, Alex is now retired.

Years ago, Rudyard Kipling wrote of men like Alex. A couplet from a Kipling poem reads in part, "Nor walk with kings nor lose the common touch."

There isn't much danger of success going to Alex's head. He'll never see 80 again, but he's still in motion. Watch him at a Kiwanis Club luncheon. He may sit at the back of the room but he's constantly keeping in touch with those around him. Does a waitress fill his coffee cup? He takes notice of her with a pleasant greeting. When a fellow Kiwanian wins an award, Alex is there with a firm handshake.

You can't help loving a man like Alex. That's why he became president of Toastmasters International. It's why the walls of his office, living room and bedroom are festooned with plaques, certificates and pictures.

There's no secret to Alex's success as a businessman and as a politican. He's on firm ground with millionaires, governors, U.S. senators and those of us who never have ascended to the heights. He never aspired to be the richest man in town but he's never going to miss a meal. He married Naida Anderson, his college sweetheart, and they had nearly 48 years of happiness until her death.

It's been a good life for this man with oratorical skills that found him ascending to the top rank in Toastmasters. He's met people of the calibre of Willy Brandt, the mayor of West Berlin, and Prince Fahad Alfaisal, the Saudi Arabian prince he entertained at his home with a serving of tea and Girl Scout cookies.

Devoted to the maxim that it is better to wear out than rust out, Alex is on the move. He continues to act as Sen. Dave Durenberger's liaison to the people of southeastern Minnesota. Lately, the senator has been twisting on the griddle over disclosures about to his earnings.

Alex brushes aside the remarks about Durenberger.

"We all make mistakes," he says, "The senator is only a human being."

Few are as adept at taking the pulse of the average man and woman in southeastern Minnesota as Alex. He's been doing it for years. He breezes into towns such as Kasson or New Richland or Caledonia in his somewhat aged car and soon is making his calls. He has a notebook filled with names and notations concerning who to see. In an average day, he may shake anywhere from 30 to 50 hands. He knows his voters. He knows their preferences in politics, their standing with their fellow citizens, their likes and dislikes. He uses them as a sounding board.

People respond to Alex.

"I like people," he says. "Rochester has been good to me. I've been lucky."

He makes no pretense of being better than the fellow at the service station who repairs a ruptured tire or the waitress who brings his coffee to him.

"My father had a job lined up at a St. Louis brewery when he left Poland," he said. "Mother and I followed later. He came down with lead poisoning and followed a doctor's suggestion to go somewhere where there was a lot of fresh air."

That proved to be a farm at Floodwood, Minn. Alex learned the rudiments of farming. Enough to carry on a learned conversation with hog producers, potato growers and dairy farmers. Then came the decision to go to college, acquire an education so he could teach and coach, and the switch after graduation to become a supervisor with Standard Oil.

In the best tradition of Horatio Alger's "Sink or Swim" heroes, Alex made himself a success at everything he undertook.●

THE CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE VIGIL FOR SOVIET JEWRY

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, as cochairman of the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews, Congressional Call to Conscience, along with my good friend and distinguished cochairman, Senator ARMSTRONG, I want to take this opportunity to thank my colleagues for their participation in the past session of the 101st Congress in the call to conscience. The call to conscience is one of the most effective means by which we in the Senate can focus attention on the plight of Soviet Jews.

While much progress has been made in the Soviet Union, and many Soviet Jews have been able to emigrate, much more still needs to be done.

Specifically, we must continue to work for the right of Soviet Jews to emigrate, to work for the release of political prisoners, and to press for an end to anti-Semitic violence in the Soviet Union.

The American people have been captivated by the whirl of events in the Soviet Union. From the White Sea to the Black Sea, a collective upheaval of Soviet Society is taking place. There is greater freedom to express opposing opinions and to worship. You can even get a big mac is Pushkin Square, and it will taste just like one in Chicago or Denver.

However, freedom is a double edged sword. Freedom of expression not only allows individuals to challenge the inefficiency of an entrenched bureaucracy, it also allows expressions of hate and violence to be voiced without fear of reprisal. Much of this expression has been directed at the Jews of the Soviet Union, who for the first time in modern Soviet history, are worshiping, meeting, discussing Judaism and Judaic culture openly. The efforts to make known the richness and beauty of the Jewish faith have frequently run into bald-faced prejudice. Some Soviet people are trying to blame the economic plight of their country on Soviet Jews. There have been announcements of a pogrom against Soviet Jews, giving rise to a very real fear of persecution from others taking out their despair and bitterness on Soviet Jews. The Ultra-Nationalist, Anti-Semitic hate group "Pamyat," for instance, carries out acts of prejudice unfettered by the state. Their tactics are more confrontational and more violent. Freedom, as we said, Mr. President, is indeed a double edged sword.

We must also keep our attention focused on the plight of political prisoners in the Soviet Union, incarcerated for "crimes" which under present Soviet law would no longer be considered crimes. Perestroika has not meant justice for many in camps and prisons such as Perm-35, the notorious prison camp written about recently by A.M. Rosenthal of the New York Times. Some individuals in prisons, such as Leonid Lubman and Mikhail Kazachov are imprisoned for crimes that today would not even warrant arrest and questioning. These cases must be reviewed in light of President Gorbachev's policy of perestroika if the Soviet Union is to show it is truly committed to reform.

There is another side to the story of Soviet Jewish emigration as well, Mr. President. As you know, some 80,000 Jews have left the Soviet Union since Mikhail Gorbachev came to power. The pace of Soviet Jewish emigration has almost reached that during the days of United States-Soviet détente under former leader Leonid Brezhnev. The rest of the story is that there continue to be hundreds of long-term refuseniks whose cases still languish, 10, 12, even 15 years after first applying to emigrate.

There are 140 remaining long-term refusenik cases who have already received refugee status from I.N.S. In Moscow and who will be permitted immediate entry when they receive permission from the Soviet Government. These Soviet jews are still denied permission to emigrate for reasons of "State secrets." The real secret, Mr. President, is that there are no state secrets held by these individuals. These Soviet Jews are the victims of a long, cruel, Soviet practice of using people as barter.

The Congressional Call to Conscience has consistently brought the cases of long-term refuseniks to the attention of this body and to the world. The efforts of individuals Senators as well as collective efforts have worked. The Soviets have responded to American pressure. In light of the upheavals in the Soviet Union, and the uncertainty it creates, our efforts on behalf of Soviet Jews must not decrease, they must be redoubled.

Let me also mention one last concern for the Soviet Jewish community both in the United States and abroad. There has been a great deal of discussion about the Jackson-Vanik trade amendments to the 1974 Trade Act. Some in Congress have advocated lifting Jackson-Vanik as a reward or favor to Mikhail Gorbachev for his efforts at democratization in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. Let us remind our colleagues that the Soviet Union has not passed any right of emigration legislation. It has not taken any steps to curb the activities of hate groups such as Pamyat, and it continues to deny Soviet Jews and others the right to emigrate on the most arbitrary grounds. Not until the Soviet Union passes emigration legislation, codifies it and implements it for some time will it then be appropriate to consider lifting Jackson-Vanik. We must ensure that the Soviets match their words with deeds. To lift Jackson-Vanik at this time would be tragic for the remaining Soviet Jews.

Mr. President, I encourage my colleagues to participate in the Congressional Call to Conscience this session. Soviet Jews continue to seek our assistance. Our vocies must be heard.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD articles from the Chicago Tribune, and the New York Times which speak to the issues raised above.

The articles follow:

SOVIET JEWS SEE SURGE OF ANTI-SEMITISM

(By James Yuenger)

Moscow.—Deep beneath perestroika and glasnost, captive to the undercurrents of a harsh and unforgiving history, the Jews of Russia are frightened once again.

As always in the Soviet Union, they are on the butt end of low-level harassment such as personal snubs and crude graffiti, such as swastikas on public buildings.

What worries them more is the government's failure to crack down on slyly anti-Semitic periodicals and ultranationalist groups that engage in Jew-baiting.

Leonid Vlasuk, a slender 22-year-old Muscovite, thought it might be wise to have some insurance after friends, learning he was Jewish, dropped him. His solution was to earn a black belt in karate.

"No problem," he said, grinning as he demonstrated a vicious head-high kick.

Other, older Jews, less agile and in any event horrified at the thought of personal violence, don't have ready-made solutions.

"What is true today is that we don't know what will happen tomorrow," said Mark Borodovsky, a soft-spoken molecular biologist. "The situation is growing dangerous. The deepening of the economic crisis may lead to outbursts of violence against Jews."

The resurgence of anti-Semitism in the USSR was a major threat at an international conference on Soviet Jewry in Moscow last week. It was the first such major gathering since just after the Bolshevik Revolution, when Lenin actively sought Jewish support to further his drive for control.

The conference ended Friday with new resolutions calling for eased emigration procedures. But because the Jewish emigration rate is the highest in decades, with 11,000 departing in November alone, Soviet delegates accorded far greater significance to a declaration that anti-Semitism at home is visibly on the increase.

They called attention to the dozens of roughnecks gathered outside the conference hall all week who jostled and jeered at participants, calling them "Jewish prostitutes" and worse names. Police made no effort to intervene.

The demonstrators were members of the Pamyat Society, a group of right-wing nationalists who have lined up behind the conservative wing of the Communist Party in opposing change.

Arkady Kisin, who traveled to the conference from Dniepropetrovsk in the Ukraine, said harassment is definitely on the rise against the 70,000 Jews in that populous Soviet republic.

Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev's glasnost has helped ease emigration, he said, but largely because that is an issue tied to Soviet foreign policy. The purely domestic aspects of anti-Semitism remain unaffected, he said.

His audience, in a makeshift Jewish museum and library tucked away in two rooms of a ninth-floor apartment in Moscow, murmured and nodded assent.

The museum, established two years ago by retired army Col. Yuri Sokol, is one of the few places in Moscow where Jews feel free to meet and discuss their concerns. They are uncomfortable in Moscow's main synagogue. Ironically, they considered it tainted by long years of official sanction.

"This is the only place where I can meet other men from the Jewish nation," said Semyon Malkin, 65. "After many years of darkness, it is a first glimmer of light at the end of the tunnel."

The museum gets about 800 visitors a week. They thumb through books and periodicals in several languages stacked ablock on over-flowing shelves and look at ancient grisly photos from Nazi concentration camps.

Among its holdings are some of the virulent anti-Semitic material currently being published in Young Guardian and Our Contemporary magazines, hateful screeds that bray in every issue that international Zionism has given strong support to Gorbachev's policies only in the interests of protecting the privileged status of Jews in Soviet society.

It is an old and flawed argument—that Jews enjoy disproportionate access to education, high government position, good apartments and all the other best things the USSR has to offer.

Borodovsky, who does computer research in genetics at the Soviet Academy of Sciences and, therefore, could himself be considered privileged, is worried less by the attacks than by the Kremlin's refusal thus far to do something about it.

Anti-Semitic hysteria, he noted, was condemned by 200 members of the Congress of People's Deputies, or parliament, who called for an official renunciation.

"But there still has been no answer from the president [Gorbachev] and the Central Committee Party," he said. "What's behind the silence, I wonder?"

A senior Western diplomat, who asked not to be named, said he had heard reports of rising but nonviolent anti-Semitism across the USSR. "And there's no doubt about it," he said, acknowledging that the Communist leadership "hasn't taken forcible steps to shut these groups up."

But at the same time, he added, the government-dominated press appears to be under orders to depict anti-Semitic groups in a critical light.

That seemingly balanced view has little appeal for Jews like those gathered at the Sokol Museum.

"I am a Soviet Jew, and yet I grew up in an assimilated family never having heard of the Holocaust," said Alexander Sklerski, 46, a painter. "When I did, it was a shock, just as Stalin's death was a shock. And now that my Jewish soul is reawakened, the anti-Semitism I see happening today is a shock."

A FEAR OF POGROMS HAUNTS SOVIET JEWS

(By William Korey)

At the historic Congress of Jewish Organizations held in Moscow in December, the most talked-about worry was the real possibility of pogroms in the near future. This month's slaughter of Aremenians by Azerbaijanis in Baku, which has repeatedly been described as a pogrom, suggests that during the nationalist unrest across the Soviet Union Jews could again become mob victims. Thus, Jews, recalling the bad old czarist days, are particularly worried by the Kremlin's continued cold silence about their fears.

When delegates from 126 Jewish cultural organizations in 70 cities assembled, the most important speech stressed a "sharp upsurge of public anti-Semitism," which is the flip side of glasnost.

Severe economic dislocations and political instability, the analysis noted, aggravate tensions and permit the Jew to be a scapegoat for the problems of perestroika.

Documentation was not difficult to come by; more than 50 desecrations of Jewish cemeteries, some 1,000 anti-Semitic rallies, and vitriolic hate leaflets in the thousands distributed everywhere. Moreover, some 60 goons from Pamyat, a chauvinist Russian national movement, greeted the delegates with cries of "Yid!" and "Jewish prostitute!"

Beyond these hate-spewing vulgarities, and reinforcing them, is the defense and promotion of Pamyat and anti-Jewish stereotypes by prominent and conservative nationalist publications.

Then, too, there are newly formed patriotic and religious organizations that would ostracize the Jew as "alien" and "cosmopolitan" (a resurrected Stalinist era code word meaning "traitor"), and populist novelists fill their books and essays with flagrant appeals to bigotry.

Only the Young Communist League newspaper has carried a Cassandralike warning. Written by the Lithuanian Jewish writer Grigory Kanovich, a member of the Congress of People's Deputies, the article described "clouds of pogroms . . . gathering over our heads." He expressed dismay that "as this incitement to murder takes place before the eyes of all," the authorities "ignore the thugs and inciters."

From President Mikhail Gorbachev not a single word has come—no repudiation of Pamyat or of omnipresent Jew-baiting. Last year, when Mr. Kanovich, joined by two members of the Academy of Sciences, Vitaly Ginzburg and Oleg Gazenko, submitted to the presdium of the Congress of People's Deputies a petition calling for a condemnation of anti-Semitism, and for creating a special committee to follow up on the issue, the petition was buried.

Even though the petition was signed by more than 200 deputies, and Mr. Kanovich is reported to have conferred briefly with Mr. Gorbachev on three occasions, urging him to make the appeal known to the Congress, not only was it not brought before the Congress, it was stricken from the list of petitions submitted to the presidium.

It is not that Soviet prosecutors are unware of Pamyat's provocations. In one instance, Pamyat's chief was summoned by the K.G.B. and warned against stirring up "national hatred." In another, the Leningrad city public prosecutor said he had brought an end to Pamyat's numerous rallies in one of the public parks because they violated the Soviet Constitution. Yet no arrests have been forthcoming anywhere and Pamyat's provocations remain undiminished.

The absence of any official public denunciation is especially disturbing. When anti-Jewish pogroms seemed to loom on the horizon in 1918, Lenin, the founder of the Soviet state, personally drafted the language in a decree requiring that "pogromists and persons inciting to pogroms be outlawed." Later, in a historic address broadcast to the Russian people, Lenin cried: "Shame on those who foment hatred toward the Jews."

President Gorbachev, glasnost's great advocate, has repeatedly insisted that he draws his inspiration from Lenin. He could take a leaf from his mentor's book by now forcefully expressing humane concern. It could even prove helpful to his program of perestoika. Certainly, he must be aware that his enemies on the right have no hesitancy in exploiting anti-Semitism in their attempts to turn back the clock.●

LEAP-YEAR CAPITOL OF THE WORLD

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask that the following letter be entered into the RECORD. Today is the last day of February, an important day for many in Anthony, NM-TX—the Leap-Year Capitol of the World.

The letter follows:

WORLDWIDE LEAP YEAR
BIRTHDAY CLUB,
Anthony, NM-TX.

The Hon. PETE V. DOMENICI,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

Dear SENATOR DOMENICI. Did you know that thousands of citizens nationwide, who were born in February, will not have a birthday this month? This is because that, by accident of birth, they were born of February 29, Leap Year Day.

Thank you very much for entering into the Congressional Record, (Volume 134#146, October 14, 1988) our request that Congress join Governors Garrey Carruthers and William B. Clements, of New Mexico and Texas respectively, in proclaiming Anthony, New Mexico-Texas, "Leap Year Capitol of the World".

To date we have 66 dues-paying members from seventeen of the United States and two foreign countries. These states include; California, Maryland, Arizona, New York, Kansas, Florida, Wisconsin, Virginia, Michigan, New Hampshire, Nebraska, Massachusetts, Maine, Montana, Connecticut, Texas and New Mexico, plus Munich, Germany and Seoul, Korea.

Response to our club has been tremendous since it was founded in February, 1988. COMMENDING LT. COL. RICHARD B. WADE

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I rise today to honor native Farmerville, LA, Lt. Col. Richard B. Wade, of the U.S. Air Force. He will be retiring today, February 28, 1990, after 21 years of exemplary service to the Air Force and to our Nation. A consummate professional, he has amassed an absolutely outstanding military record. Lieutenant Colonel Wade completed officer training school as a distinguished graduate prior to entering pilot training in 1969. After completing pilot training he was assigned to the Republic of Vietnam where he flew 257 combat missions in the A-37 and was awarded three Distinguished Flying Crosses as well as 10 Air Medals. After his combat tour in Vietnam, Lieutenant Colonel Wade served as an instructor pilot to American and allied pilots. In follow-on tours, Lieutenant Colonel Wade served as an air liaison officer with the Army, and later as one of the initial pilots assigned to the first operation A-10 squadrons. He later served as an operational test pilot at the U.S. Tactical Fighter Weapons Center. Lieutenant Colonel Wade completed his flying career as a squadron commander in the F-117 Stealth Fighter Unit at Nellis AFB, NV.

In 1987 Lieutenant Colonel Wade was assigned to the Pentagon as a branch chief in the tactical fighter division and subsequently served as the F-117 program monitor. He ended his career as an action officer and deputy division chief in Air Force legislative liaison. In this capacity, he is credited with developing and then articulating key Air Force initiatives on Capitol Hill. As a result, Lieutenant Colonel Wade ensured congressional support for important tactical fighter programs which will enhance force readiness and capabilities Air Force wide. In addition, Lieutenant Colonel Wade has organized and attended numerous meetings between senior DOD leaders and Members of Congress. Those meetings have always been productive, benefiting myself, many of my colleagues, and thousands of our constituents.

A gentleman of Lieutenant Colonel Wade's talent and integrity is rare indeed. While his honorable service will be genuinely missed, it gives me great pleasure today to recognize him before my colleagues and to wish him clear skies and favorable winds as he brings to a close a long and distinguished career in the service of the U.S. Air Force and our country. His wife, Judy, has been by his side the whole way, supporting him through the good times and the bad times that characterize military life. His son, Richard, now an honor student at Arizona State University, and his son, Robert, also an honor student at Oakton High School, are both fine young men who are following their father's footsteps on the road toward high achievement. This family has served our Nation well. I salute them and wish them Godspeed in the years ahead.●

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, it is a great privilege for me to join my colleagues in commemorating Black History Month. Although February has annually been designated as Black History Month, the tradition can be traced back to 1926 when the late Dr. Carter G. Woodson conceived the celebration as a means for all Americans to learn about the extraordinary contributions of African-Americans to this country. The celebration is an important time for reflection on the part of every citizen of Maryland and indeed the entire country about the role African-Americans have made in our Nation's life and about the struggles they have endured.

We, in Maryland, are particularly fortunate to have a magnificent African-American tradition with Marylanders who have excelled in fields as varied as journalism, law, medicine and the arts. Benjamin Banneker of Baltimore County, became known as the pioneer African-American of science. He is best remembered for his farmer's almanac and for his Presidential appointment to serve on the surveying team to determine the boundary lines and lay out the streets of the District of Columbia.

Frederick Douglass was born a slave on Maryland's Eastern Shore and escaped when he was 19. Against great odds, he learned how to read and write as a young boy and spent most of his free time improving these skills. Mr. Douglass became an eloquent and forceful speaker, abolitionist and newspaper editor, earning an international reputation as an advocate for civil liberties, acting on behalf of all oppressed and poor people.

Harriet Tubman was also born into slavery in Dorchester County. Known as Moses, she escaped to freedom after overhearing a conversation that she was to be sold. She returned to the South 19 times over many years to guide more than 300 men, women and children from slavery to freedom through the "underground railroad." During the Civil War, she served as a nurse, scout and spy.

The courageous tradition which Benjamin Banneker, Frederick Douglass, and Harriet Tubman exemplified is a long and distinguished one. In this century, Marylanders take special pride in Thurgood Marshall, Associate Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, who was born in Baltimore. The first African-American appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court, he began his career as an attorney for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People [NAACP] and represented the NAACP in the landmark case, Brown versus the Board of Education of Topeka, KS, in 1954.

Mr. President, I would like to mention three other Marylanders who have made singular contributions to the Civil Rights Movement. One is Clarence Mitchell, Jr., who served as the head of the NAACP's Washington office in 1950 until his retirement in 1978. For nearly three decades he lobbied ceaselessly for civil rights legislation and is widely regarded as the architect of all major civil rights legislation designed to end segregation and inequality. Another is Juanita Mitchell, a lawyer and the wife of Clarence Mitchell, Jr., who unequivocally established her own reputation as a champion of the poor and disadvantaged citizens of Baltimore. yet a third Marylander is Parren Mitchell, a former colleague in the House of Representatives who served for 16 years, devoting his great ability and energy to the causes of African-Americans. He continues to work for the fundamental principles which are the bedrock of our Nation and meant for all Americans—peace, equal justice under the law, and opportunity. Today his efforts range from fighting drug abuse to championing equal opportunities for minority businessmen.

We dedicate this month to celebrating these men and women, to honor those who, in the face of great obstacles, have triumphed oppression. At the same time that we honor these and other leaders who have left an indelible mark on our Nation's history, we must pledge to address ourselves to the goals and dreams which guided them. We must look to the future and seek to assure all young Americans that the doors of opportunity will be open to them—that their efforts will be recognized and their achievements honored.

Many schools in the area are having Black History Month speech competitions, and I would like to congratulate Jamie Jefferson, an eighth grade student and daughter of a member of my staff. Jamie won third prize for her speech in the Arlington County Black History Month Oratorical Contest. Her speech emphasized role models such as actor and comedian Bill Cosby, olympic star Florence Joyner, musicians Stevie Wonder and Diana Ross, Gov. Douglas Wilder and her uncle, Federal Judge Perker Meeks.

In Maryland, the celebration of Black History Month will highlight the ongoing cultural contributions of African-Americans. There will be art exhibits, movies, plays, lectures, and seminars to honor these Americans. This is an opportunity for us to reflect on the struggles for equality in this country and to experience the rich cultural heritage of African-Americans and their enormous contributions to this great Nation.●

INFANT MORTALITY

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, I rise today to voice my support for legislation to combat infant mortality.

Earlier this month, a group of southern lawmakers met with Dr. Louis Sullivan, Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services. The Members of the Congressional Sun Belt Caucus' Task Force on Infant Mortality Discussed the administration's efforts to combat infant mortality and encouraged initiatives, particularly in the South, where infant mortality rates remain unusually high.

Ten of the twelve States with the highest infant mortality rates are in the South.

I have a particular interest in this issue since my home State of Alabama has the fourth highest infant mortality rate in the Nation, followed by Georgia, South Carolina, and Mississippi.

Consequently, each year since my election to the Senate, I have spoken here in the Senate and to various organizations regarding the national crisis of infant mortality and have supported legislation to reduce infant mortality in the United States.

Last year, I joined with a number of my colleagues as a cosponsor of S. 339, the Medicaid Infant Mortality and Children's Act of 1989, introduced by Senator BRADLEY of New Jersey. A portion of that measure was incorporated into the omnibus budget reconciliation expanding Medicaid coverage for females and children 6 and under at or below 133 percent of the poverty level.

I commend Senator BRADLEY for once again taking a leadership role on this issue with the introduction today of the Infant Mortality and Children's Health Act of 1990. I am proud to be an original cosponsor of this measure, which I believe to be a bold step in addressing the issue of infant mortality.

This legislation will make approximately 223,000 pregnant women and infants eligible for Medicaid coverage each year. Between July 1991 and 2002, roughly 1.7 million children born after September 30, 1983, would be eligible for Medicaid coverage. I can think of no better investment we can make than in our children and the future of our country.

Mr. President, it is my hope that the day is fast approaching that no Member of Congress will have to make statements or draft legislation on infant mortality.

It is my hope that in the not too distant future in my home State of Alabama, more than 12 of every 1,000 live births will not end in death.

It is my hope that one day the United States, which ranks first in per capita expenditures for health care, will no longer have an infant mortality rate ranked 20th among the 22 major economic powers.

Mr. President, I am pleased to see the administration taking an active interest in making these goals a reality.

The Bush administration has created a task force to study the infant mortality crisis and recommend possible courses of action to confront the problem.

Also, the Department of Health and Human Services has proposed a $63 million increase in public health service programs for infant mortality.

Twenty-five million dollars is being set aside for pregnant women to obtain a variety of health and welfare services through the development of a one stop shopping program for low-income women.

These are significant efforts in the fight to reduce infant mortality. However, much remains to be done.

We must step up efforts to ensure the availability, affordability, and accessibility of quality health and prenatal care, especially in rural areas. The current urban/rural reimbursement differential has played a major role in discouraging gynecologists and obstetricians, as well as many other medical professionals, from practicing in rural areas. As I have stated before, the maldistribution of health care professionals in urban centers will continue as more rural hospitals are forced to close their doors. Pregnant women in rural areas who are already disinclined to seek prenatal care are further discouraged if they have to travel long distances to receive medical attention.

Also, we must continue to seek ways to provide adequate health insurance. Approximately 10 million women of childbearing age and 11 million children have inadequate or no health insurance whatsoever. These individuals are at high risk of receiving late prenatal care or none at all.

We must be vigilant in our efforts to educate the public about the importance of proper nutrition and prenatal care and treatment for infants during the first year of life.

We cannot lose sight of the fact that infant mortality is not just a medical issue, rather it is linked with a number of our society's most pressing social issues. Homelessness, poverty, unsanitary living conditions, adolescent pregnancy, smoking, alcohol, and substance abuse, all threaten the survival of an unborn child.

Finally, Mr. President, in a report prepared by the National Commission to Prevent Infant Mortality, we are warned that unless we continue our fight against infant mortality, "we will lose more American infants than we have lost soldiers in all the wars fought by the Nation in this century." Mr. President, we cannot let that happen.●

SMALL COMMUNITY ENVIRONMENTAL ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1990

● Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, yesterday I joined with 18 of my colleagues in introducing legislation critical to the environmental and economic health of our small communities.

This legislation, the Small Community Environmental Assistance Act of 1990, will provide rural communities with needed Federal assistance in the construction and development of environmental facilities—facilities such as wastewater treatment plants, drinking water systems, landfills, and recycling projects. Its approach is fiscally sensible: It would contribute Federal funds to State revolving loan funds, which in turn would be used to provide low interest loans to small communities and grants to financially disadvantaged communities for the purpose of financing these projects.

Mr. President, in April we will be celebrating the 20th anniversary of Earth Day. It will be an opportunity to acknowledge the environmental gains we have made over the past two decades. As importantly, it will also be an opportunity to acknowledge the implications of this progress; namely, the increased environmental regulatory and financial burden we have asked small towns and local governments to bear.

With the passage of the Solid Waste Disposal Act, for example, we required communities across the country to either retrofit local dumps to meet strict Federal standards or to close them. As a result, about 650 landfills in Wisconsin will be closed this year. Landfill closure costs alone—not including the cost of developing an alternative solid waste management system—average between $25,000 to $50,000 per acre. For many small towns, this will mean a total bill of more than $200,000, excluding the cost of developing an alternative solid waste system.

It is clear that small communities are increasingly unable to meet the requirements of the Solid Waste Disposal Act, as well as those of the Safe Drinking Water Act and the Federal Water Pollution Control Act. According to the Environmental Protection Agency, small town water systems, which serve 8 percent of the U.S. population, account for 90 percent of the violations under the Safe Drinking Water Act. More than 80 percent of the communities in violation of sewage treatment requirements are small towns.

These violations have certainly not been willful. Rather, they are the result of not only the limited tax bases and financial resources available to small towns, but the bias of existing Federal environmental programs toward larger municipalities. For example, of the Federal sewage treatment grant funds made to date, 92 percent have gone to large communities. A mere 8 percent has been spent on small town treatment systems.

Mr. President, the answer to this problem is not to delay the implementation of these statutes and needed environmental protection. The answer is to provide the financial and technical assistance these small communities need to be in compliance with them. The legislation we introduced yesterday is designed to do just that.

There have been other efforts to provide this type of assistance. One of these was an amendment offered by Senator SANFORD and myself last year to the rural development bill. The amendment authorized the use of Farmers Home Administration funds to help rural communities develop alternative solid waste plans. While the amendment passed and the legislation passed the Senate, the House has not yet taken action on it.

I am hopeful that the House will act on that legislation soon. I am also hopeful that this legislation, the Small Communities Environmental Assistance Act, will see prompt action in both bodies of Congress this year. I commend Senator BAUCUS for his work on this bill, and look forward to working with him on making this legislation a priority for Congress this year.●

HONORING JOHN F. GORDON, A DISTINGUISHED CITIZEN OF WASHINGTON STATE

● Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, each of us occasionally encounters individuals of integrity, dedicated service and achievement in the course of our official duties and travels. We are blessed with the good fortune to meet and confer with men and women of exceptional abilities and stature.

I am pleased to bring to your attention such a person, a good friend and distinguished leader, Mr. John F. (Jack) Gordon.

Jack Gordon has served as executive director of the Restaurant Association of the State of Washington for 23 years. In this capacity he has established many worthy programs for the hospitality industry and the general welfare of his home State. He has, in fact, been a one-man public relations emissary for Washington State. Let me detail some of his many accomplishments in this regard.

Over 40 years ago, Jack Gordon organized a successful welcome-to-Washington program for a former Member of this august body, President Harry S. Truman. From that beginning, he went on to organize ceremonies honoring a broad spectrum of nationally and internationally respected figures, including Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Ford, and Carter; Vice Presidents Nixon, Mondale, and Humphrey; Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip; Crown Prince Akikito; the King and Queen of Sweden; the Presidents of the Republic of Iceland and West Germany; Gen. Douglas MacArthur and Adlai Stevenson; and astronauts of several different missions.

But Jack Gordon did not stop at honoring outstanding individuals. He also made sure that worthy groups received Washington State's accolades. The U.S. Army, in fact, presented to him an Award of Merit for his leadership in honoring over 1 million returning Korean war veterans, an act for which he was also commended by President Eisenhower and Vice President Nixon.

I am especially grateful to Jack for his role in creating the Plaza of the States for the Seattle World's Fair. This site is now used annually to honor naturalized citizens of the United States. The Plaza of the States is a dignified and beautiful location for this ceremony.

I could go on: Jack has served in leadership roles for 20 different civic organizations, including 10 years on the Seattle Human Rights Commission. Let me conclude, however, by noting that on March 14, 1990, Jack Gordon will be honored by his fellow Washingtonians at a dinner which I hope to attend.●

EXCELLENCE AT HASTINGS MIDDLE SCHOOL

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, today I rise to recognize an outstanding educational institution, Hastings Middle School, from the great State of Minnesota.

I recently had the opportunity to visit Hastings Middle School and present to the students and staff the Excellence in Education Award for their truly superb achievement. Hastings Middle School received this award following a rigorous, multistage review process, where they compete on both the State and national levels.

This award, which is sponsored by the U.S. Department of Education, goes only to those schools who are unusually effective in educating their students with the resources they have available. Last year only 218 schools received this prestigious award.

I strongly believe the time and money we put into education is an investment in America's future. My support for education is unfailing, and Hastings Middle School is an example of a very wise investment.

Therefore, Mr. President, it is with great honor and respect that I salute the students, faculty and administration of Hastings Middle School on their accomplishments.●

CONGRATULATING ROBERT J. SHERER

● Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I rise today to congratulate Mr. Robert J. Sherer, of Las Vegas, NV, a recipient of the much coveted "Others Award." This award presented by the Salvation Army recognizes volunteers who have given generously of their time and energy.

Mr. Sherer has been unrelenting in his efforts for the Salvation Army. Presently, he serves as the chairman of the Las Vegas Salvation Army Advisory Board, and he has chaired the annual Salute Dinner for 3 years. In one of his many pursuits of community service, he personally located over 5 acres to purchase for a new emergency lodge and family service department and obtained all necessary approval for the project from the Las Vegas City Council. He has also coordinated the effort to raise the half-million dollars needed to renovate the existing facility. In addition, he has worked extensively during the holiday season, volunteering for numerous Salvation Army activities.

In an age where the value of community service is increasingly important, yet so rarely recognized, I ask my colleagues to join me in saluting Robert Sherer—a dedicated community leader whose accomplishments are an inspiration to us all.●

THIEVERY AND EMBEZZLEMENT OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY TRUST FUNDS

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, there has been much discussion of the budgetary treatment of the Social Security trust funds. The current situation is that, because of Federal accounting rules, the Social Security trust fund reserves offset the deficit in the rest of the Government.

In effect, Social Security lends the money to the rest of the U.S. Government. But, when doing so the U.S. Government makes an ironclad promise to pay those funds back to Social Security—with interest—whenever Social Security needs those funds.

The IOU's that Social Security gets when it lends the funds to the rest of the Government are backed by the full faith and credit of the U.S. Government. That remains the safest investment in the world. To claim that the U.S. Government will not pay back Social Security is to claim the U.S. Government will default on its obligations.

I raise this, because, earlier today, I voted against a Sasser amendments to the National Volunteer Service Act. The Sasser amendment was a resolution only—it would have no effect on any law and not change anything. One respect of the Sasser resolution indicated that we should take Social Security out of the calculation of the deficit because the current treatment of Social Security in the budget is "thievery and embezzlement" of Social Security's reserves.

If I really believed that the current situation was thievery and embezzlement, then I would not be satisfied with a resolution saying we should fix it. I would demand that we change the law—now.

But the point is, the current situation with regard to Social Security is not thievery and embezzlement. The current situation is wrong and needs to be changed, I'll agree, but it does not represent thievery and embezzlement. That is why I voted against the Sasser resolution.

I should make another point. Whatever the current situation, Congress voted to create it. The 1983 Social Security amendments—which saved Social Security from going bankrupt—and the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings created the current situation. The 1983 Social Security Amendments caused Social Security to build reserves for the long-run solvency of the program. And the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings laws spelled out in black and white that Social Security reserves were going to offset the non-Social Security deficit for a period of time.

I don't think that is thievery, but if it is, it was created by the Social Security Amendments of 1983 and the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law.

I don't believe that the Government is stealing anything from Social Security, and I don't believe Senators who voted for the Social Security rescue in 1983 and Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law voted for "theft and embezzlement."

Mr. President, now that I have gotten that off my chest, I want to be clear on one thing. We do need to take steps to ensure that the Social Security reserves are separate from the calculation of the deficit. We cannot use Social Security to offset the deficit.

In fact, soon after the vote on the Sasser amendment, we voted on an amendment offered by Senator GRAMM that also resolved to take OASDI out of the deficit calculation. I voted for that resolution. We must wall Social Security off from the rest of the budget, and take steps to ensure the Social Security reserves are not used to offset the deficit. We must do so carefully, so that we protect Social Security and our economy.●

CHARLES HAUGHEY AND JAMES BAKER ARE ON THE RIGHT TRACK: CLOSER COORDINATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITY IS NEEDED

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, as the United States focuses increasingly on Eastern Europe and the challenges of adjusting our policies to the new security situation there, we should not forget that our most important economic and political relationship in Europe during the next decade will be with the European Community. Accordingly, I warmly welcome this week's visit of Irish Prime Minister Charles J. Haughey in his capacity as President of the Community's European Council. His visit is most timely. "The Revolution of 1989" has wrought truly incredible changes in Eastern Europe, changes that make it appropriate for both the United States and the European Community to examine together ways to preserve and strengthen Western unity.

Last week, in an interview in the Washington Post, Mr. Haughey said "the need to keep the United States in Europe is vital." I fully agree. We need to stay involved. In an age of intercontinental ballistic missiles and extensive economic and political interdependence we are not free to retreat into isolationism. We have no choice but to remain actively engaged with Europe.

The transformation of the European security landscape we are witnessing includes dangers, some unforeseeable. A coordinated Western stance can provide needed stability as old regimes are swept away and new democratic institutions and market economies grow strong enough to take their place.

Mr. Haughey has also called for steps to be taken to institutionalize an increased American role in Europe's future "to avoid a situation where the community, acting through its own procedures, presents the United States with some particular fait accompli." This is exactly right. Given the cumbersome decisionmaking mechanisms of the European Community and the difficulty of reversing decisions that prove impractical, we need some mechanism that allows the fullest possible discussions between the European Community and our Government before decisions that affect us are made; we need some way to avoid unnecessary dispute and acrimony that can weaken the fabric of our invaluable partnership. Prime Minister Haughey's visit and the proposals he brings with him represent an opportunity to advance the dialogue called for by Secretary Baker in Berlin. I urge both partners to treat this friendly exploration with the urgency it deserves. As "1992" grows ever closer, and as "European Political Cooperation" takes on additional responsibilities, the United States and the European Community need to find a wide variety of ways to deepen understanding between the world's two strongest economic and political entities.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, February 28, 1990.

Hon. JOHN WARNER,
Ranking Republican, Senate Armed Services Committee.

DEAR SENATOR WARNER: I would like to take this opportunity to endorse Stephen A. Conver's nomination to become the Assistant Secretary of the Army for Research, Development, and Acquisition. I urge all Senators to cast an "aye" vote when Mr. Conver's nomination is considered today.

Steve Conver has worked as my Minority Staff Director on the House Armed Services Committee for more than four years. He has served me and all committee Republicans well during this time and he will be missed. As the Senate Armed Services Committee's recent endorsement of Steve indicates, he is well qualified for the challenging job of Senior Acquisition Executive for the Department of the Army. Before coming to the House Armed Services Committee, Steve served as Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Air Force for Programs and Budget, with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and as an active-duty officer in the Air Force for ten years. His broad range of personal, political, and professional experience will prove to be an invaluable asset to the Army.

Beyond our professional relationship, I consider Steve and his wife Nan to be personal friends. As you so eloquently stated during your committee's consideration of Steve's nomination, accepting a job like the Assistant Secretary of the Army is not just a personal commitment, but also a family commitment. I am convinced that with the full support of Nan and his two sons Brad and Andy, Steve will excel in the years ahead. I wish Steve only the best and want to assure each and every member of the Senate that you can confirm him without reservation.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM L. DICKINSON,
Ranking Republican, House Armed Services Committee.

STEPHEN K. CONVER

Stephen K. Conver is a member of the professional staff of the House Armed Services Committee, where he serves as the principal staff advisor to Congressman Bill Dickinson (the Ranking Republican) and the twenty other Republican Members of the HASC. The scope of his responsibilities includes all defense matters under the jurisdiction of the Committee.

Prior to joining the Armed Services Committee in December 1985, Mr. Conver served for four years on the staff of Secretary of the Air Force Verne Orr as Deputy Assistant Secretary (Programs and Budget). In this career Senior Executive Service position, he was responsible for overseeing the development, approval, and execution of the Air Force budget.

Between 1975 and 1981, Mr. Conver held several positions with the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, beginning as an operations analyst and progressing to Chief of Analysis and Planning for the agency.

After receiving his bachelor of science degree from the U.S. Air Force Academy in 1966, Mr. Conver served for nine years as a commissioned officer in the Air Force. He earned a Master's Degree in Operations Research from Ohio State University in 1970. Mr. Conver's Air Force experience covered a broad range of subjects, including technical analysis of Soviet weapon systems, long-range planning studies in support of advanced Air Force weapons acquisitions, and analysis of U.S. strategic force options under a SALT agreement.

Mr. Conver was born in Memphis, Tennessee and grew up in Cincinnati, Ohio. He presently resides in Great Falls, Virginia with his wife Nan and his sons Brad and Andy. His hobbies include running, golf, and coaching youth basketball.

STATEMENT ON THE NOMINATION OF COLIN MCMILLAN

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today to voice my support for President Bush's nomination to be Assistant Secretary of Defense for Production and Logistics, Colin McMillan. I have known Colin for many years, and I am happy to see my good friend and a fellow New Mexican being confirmed today for this important position.

The Assistant Secretary of Defense for Production and Logistics is charged with enormous responsibilities ranging from serving as an adviser to the Under Secretary of Defense on the construction and maintenance of all installations and facilities under the direction of the Department of Defense to exercising authority and control over the Defense Logistics Agency, and the Defense Management College. Mr. President, clearly this position requires strong leadership, superior management skills, and the desire to sacrifice.

Colin McMillan brings to this job a wide range of leadership and management experience in the military, in government and in business. I have known Colin for over 20 years Mr. President, and I can tell you that, since I have known him, he has exhibited the leadership and management skills that make him an excellent choice for this position.

He served our country as a member of the U.S. Marine Corps from 1957 to 1960 as platoon commander, company executive officer, and company commander. He was discharged in 1960 as a first lieutenant. Colin then went on to serve for 7 more years in the Marine Corps Reserves, eventually achieving the rank of major.

Mr. President, Colin McMillan has been a prominent figure in New Mexico government for almost three decades. He served in the New Mexico House of Representatives from 1971 to 1983. He served as chairman of the House Taxation and Revenue Committee for 4 years, he was nominated for Lieutenant Governor in 1982, and was a candidate for Governor in 1986.

Furthermore, Colin brings to this job the level-headed management ability that has made him a successful businessman. Colin is the chairman of the board and chief executive officer of Permian Exploration Corp., a high-tech energy exploration firm, the managing partner of the Three Rivers Ranch in Lincoln and Otero counties, and chairman of the board of First Federal Savings Bank of Roswell.

As budget constraints take bigger bites out of the defense budget, Colin will have the very important job of ensuring that our tax dollars are spent wisely, and I have no doubt that the superior managerial skills he has gained as a businessman will be of great value to the President as well as to the Secretary of Defense.

Through his record as a marine, as a State representative, and as a businessman, Colin McMillan has demonstrated the leadership skills necessary to provide the quality of performance that is demanded by the position for which President Bush has nominated him.

Furthermore, Mr. President, Colin has demonstrated that he is willing to sacrifice his own interests in the interests of serving the President and the United States. Although he is a very successful businessman in New Mexico, he has agreed to comply with our rules in order that he may be able to serve the President and the United States.

I look forward to the confirmation of Colin McMillan by the full Senate. Mr. President, this is another example of President Bush looking to New Mexico for strong leaders to place in his administration, and he has once again picked a man that will serve his administration and the United States very well.

The Senate proceeded to consider Senate Joint Resolution 153, a joint resolution designating the third week in May 1990 as "National Tourism Week," which was read the third time and passed as follows:

Whereas travel and tourism is the third largest retail industry and the second largest private employer in the United States, generating more than five million five hundred thousand jobs and indirectly employing another two million two hundred thousand Americans;

Whereas total travel expenditures in the United States amount to more than $313,000,000,000 annually, or about 6.4 percent of the Gross National Product;

Whereas tourism is an essential American export, as thirty-three million seven hundred thousand foreign travelers spend approximately $18,000,000,000 annually in the United States;

Whereas development and promotion of tourism have brought new industries, jobs, and economic revitalization to cities and regions across the United States;

Whereas tourism contributes substantially to personal growth, education, appreciation of intercultural differences, and the enhancement of international understanding and good will; and

Whereas the abundant natural and manmade attractions of the United States and the hospitality of the American people establish the United States as the preeminent destination for both foreign and domestic travelers: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning on the second Sunday in May 1990 is designated as "National Tourism Week". AMENDMENT NO. 1281

(Purpose: To change the year of "National Foster Care Month" from 1989 to 1990)

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator Thurmond, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ARMSTRONG], for Mr. THURMOND, proposes an amendment number 1281.

Page 2, line 3, of resolve clause, strike "1989," and insert in lieu thereof "1990,".

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate is acting today on my joint resolution which designates May of this year as "National Foster Care Month." I have offered an amendment which changes the designated date from May 1989 to May 1990.

It is acknowledged that a family environment with loving and caring parents is the ideal situation for children. However, in the United States there are hundreds of thousands of foster children who through no fault of their own have been deprived of this normal home relationship involving love, shelter, and other needs that are the basic necessities of all children. Foster parents volunteer their time, energy, and material resources 24 hours a day, 7 days week, to help enable these children to develop into mature responsible, and productive adults.

Our Nation's foster parents have a long and proud tradition of reaching out to those children who need them most. We need to publicly recognize these efforts and call attention to the vital needs of all foster children in the United States. Acknowledgment of the valuable contributions of foster care parents will provide for greater public awareness of and community support for these Americans.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is an agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 1281) was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments? If there are no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble, as amended, was agreed to.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 10), with its preamble, reads as follows:

S.J. RES. 10

Whereas there are more than 250,000 licensed foster families in the United States who temporarily provide guidance, emotional support, food, shelter, and nurture to children who cannot remain in their own home;

Whereas foster parents devotedly and unselfishly open their home and family life to children in need;

Whereas foster parents are a vital part in permanency planning to protect the best interests of a foster child;

Whereas foster parents work cooperatively with human service agencies and biological parents to strengthen family life;

Whereas foster parents must have the commitment of the national, State and local communities in terms of funding, support, and training; and

Whereas the National Foster Parent Association holds its annual training conference during the month of May 1990: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the month of May, 1990, is designated as "National Foster Care Month". The President is requested to issue a proclamation calling on the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, on behalf of Senator THURMOND, I send to the desk an amendment to the title and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read:

To designate the month of May 1990 as "National Foster Care Month."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the title.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVIN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE COLLAPSE OF COMMUNISM

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I strongly recommend the following article written by Fred Barnes which recently appeared in the Reader's Digest. I believe that Mr. Barnes is on the mark when he details how the "determined defense" of the Reagan and Bush administrations share a large part of the credit for the incredible changes happening in Eastern Europe. Clearly, the Communist system has failed and I believe that this article helps illustrate some of the reasons why. I urge my colleagues to carefully review it. I am sure they will find it as interesting and insightful as I have.

COMMUNISM'S INCREDIBLE COLLAPSE: HOW IT HAPPENED

(By Fred Barnes)

How could the flame of freedom, dampened by so many years of Soviet tyranny, burn so suddenly and brightly in Eastern Europe?

A decade ago, Soviet power appeared to be gaining everywhere. The Soviets solidified their hold on Angola and Ethiopia, acquired new client states in Nicaragua and Cambodia and launched their invasion of Afghanistan. Massive demonstrations by communist-backed "peace" groups in Europe led President Jimmy Carter to drop plans for deploying the neutron bomb in West Germany. Government officials on both sides of the Iron Curtain believed that America was suffering a severe loss of will. Communism's advance seemed inexorable.

But by 1989, the Soviet troops had retreated from Afghanistan. In Poland, the independent trade union Solidarity—formed nine years earlier—toppled the communist regime. It took less than nine months for dissidents to bring the Hungarian government to its knees; nine weeks for East Germany; nine days for Czechoslovakia; five for Romania.

This heady rush of freedom across Eastern Europe is one of the most profound political and social changes in history. Here are the people, events and forces that turned the tide:

DETERMINED DEFENSE

When the Soviet army invaded Afghanistan, the U.S. Senate retaliated by refusing to ratify the SALT II treaty. Even worse, from the Soviet standpoint, the United States dramatically hiked military spending.

In 1981, the communist bloc got another shock. A new American President, Ronald Reagan, began fulfilling his promise to challenge the Soviets, not placate them. Over the next few years, he accelerated the military buildup and announced the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), a space-based system for protecting against missile attack. He backed anti-communist rebels in Nicaragua, Angola, Cambodia and Afghanistan. And with American troops, he liberated the island of Grenada from communist thugs.

The Soviets' confidence was shaken. Soon Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev was admitting "foreign policy difficulties." Marshal N. V. Ogarkov, chief of the Soviet general staff, complained his forces were falling behind in military technology.

In 1985, when the new Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, met Ronald Reagan in Geneva, the thing that impressed him most was the American President's determination to build the missile defense system. "Gorbachev witnessed Reagan's deep belief that SDI would work," says Paul Nitze, former chief arms-control adviser at the State Department. "SDI really bothered Gorbachev. He made that clear in every meeting."

Gorbachev's military chiefs had warned that SDI involved technologies the Soviets couldn't match. SDI epitomized the scientific-technological-military revolution Ogarkov had foreseen. And the Reagan Administration, led by Assistant Defense Secretary Richard Perle, repeatedly blocked the Soviets from buying high technology from America and its allies.

The Western Europeans also pressured the Soviets. NATO forged ahead with military modernization. German voters spurned Soviet "peace overtures" and elected a government that voted to deploy new intermediate-range missiles.

In 1936, Gorbachev backpedaled and accepted a Reagan offer scorned for five years: the Soviets would eliminate all intermediate-range missiles in Europe, if the United States and its allies removed theirs. In 1988, with American-supplied "Stinger" missiles destroying Red Army helicopters in Afghanistan, Gorbachev ordered his troops withdrawn from the engagement he acknowledged as the Soviets' "bleeding wound."

Military pressure from America and its Western allies had caused the Soviets to flinch.

A SYSTEM THAT FAILED

In the 1980s, communist economies, always inefficient, went belly up. Before, they had lacked consumer and luxury goods. Now perennial shortages of staples worsened as well. When Soviet miners went on strike in 1989, their demands included soap, toilet paper, and sugar.

But what alarmed communist leaders most was the technological revolution sweeping the West. "Anything that springs from innovation does not flourish under a centrally controlled system," says Judy Shelton, author of The Coming Soviet Crash.

Without market prices, the system of production goes haywire. In Poland there was a toothpaste shortage because chalk (a key ingredient) was unavailable, even though Poland has ample chalk deposits. Jam couldn't be exported because factories lacked the paper to print labels. As much as 40 percent of coal production was used up in coal extraction.

Meanwhile, the myth of the vaunted Marxist health system was painfully exposed. In the U.S.S.R. "life expectancy was lower in the mid-1980s than it had been in the mid-1960s," says demographer Nick Eberstadt of Harvard. "According to the World Bank, there is not a single country today in Eastern Europe where life expectancy is as high as in Jamaica."

Without incentives to work, save and invest, the standard of living plummeted throughout the communist world. In Poland workers recited a couplet to Michael Kaufman of the New York Times that encapsulated the communist work ethic: "If you lie down, or you stand erect/A thousand zlotys you expect." The result was that no one really worked.

WAGE WAR WITH IDEAS

Before President Reagan's trip to Berlin in 1987, a White House speechwriter asked him what he most wanted to say there. "Tear down the wall," the President shot back. Some State Department and White House officials tried to expunge that cry from Reagan's text as too provocative. But the line remained. "Just because our relationship with the Soviet Union is improving doesn't mean we have to deny the truth," Reagan observed later. "That is what got us into such a weak position in the first place."

For decades, Presidents set the highest priority on getting along with the Soviets while maintaining a military balance. Waging a war of ideas was spurned. Not by the communists, however. To them ideology is more important than military strength. It gives them the justification for their actions.

Reagan and a few other democratic leaders, such as British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, realized this. They set out boldly to dispel the notion that democracies no longer believed in themselves. "We were always too worried we would offend the Soviets," says Reagan. "Well, so what?"

The President scotched diplomatic cant about "stability" and "global equilibrium." Says his speechwriter Anthony R. Dolan, "No one will mount the ramparts for global equilibrium. But moral force, summoned by words, has power. People react to it."

In a speech before the British Parliament in 1982, Reagan attacked communism as immoral and inefficient, and said it will wind up "on the ash heap of history." When the Soviets complained bitterly, Reagan knew he had hit home. In 1983, he called the Soviets an "evil empire." That, said Reagan, "woke up everybody."

SPIRITUAL FORCE

When Tadeusz Mazowiecki took over in August 1989 as Poland's first noncommunist prime minister in 45 years, he was asked if he was a socialist. "I am a Catholic," he answered tersely.

Without the spur of religious faith, anti-communist dissidents would never have succeeded. Lutherans in East Germany turned a government-sponsored anti-NATO "peace campaign" into a protest against tyranny. In Czechoslovakia, many leaders of Civic Forum, the organization that ousted the communist government, are deeply religious. In Russia, Jews put the world spotlight on religious persecution and other human-rights abuses.

But the election of John Paul II, a Polish Pope, in 1978 was the signal event. When he visited Poland in 1978, six million of his countrymen, a sixth of the population, turned out to see him. He proclaimed Christianity and communism incompatible. The church became the center of political protest in Poland.

With the Pope's support, Solidarity was formed, and John Paul II sent word to Moscow that if Soviet forces crushed Solidarity, he would go to Poland and stand with his people. The Soviets were so alarmed they hatched a plot to kill him. In 1981 the Pope was shot by a professional killer in St. Peter's Square, but miraculously he survived.

The Pope cautioned Solidarity leaders, particularly his friend Lech Walesa, to proceed slowly. They did. In 1988 General Wojciech Jaruzelski, the Polish communist leader, went to them offering a deal. Solidarity insisted on an election, which it carried with some 80 percent of the vote. When the communist government fell, the impact on Eastern Europe was electrifying.

POWER OF WORDS

Jan Nowak, the head of Radio Free Europe (RFE) for 25 years, visited his native Poland in 1989, and he was hailed as a national hero. Asked if RFE had been important to democracy in Poland, Walesa replied: "Would there be earth without the sun?"

RFE, Radio Liberty and Voice of America, the three American-run radio networks, plus Britain's BBC, kept East Europeans from total isolation and immunized them against communist indoctrination. When Gdansk was blacked out in 1980 during a Solidarity strike, RFE aired articles from Western reporters back to the city, assuring strikers their story was getting out.

Radio wasn't the only medium that helped thwart communist repression. West German television is received by 90 percent of East Germans. In Poland a strongly anti-communist movie called The Interrogation was officially banned in 1984, but it was viewed by thousands on VCRs and was the most talked-about film of the year. In Hungary satellite dishes in many villages pick up Western TV. Copiers and fax machines proliferated in the Eastern bloc and became powerful weapons in the hands of dissidents.

DECISIVE LEADERSHIP

After Solidarity won all but one of the seats it was allowed to contest in the election last year, the communists still held power, relying on two splinter parties for their parliamentary majority. Against his advisers' unanimous counsel, Walesa made an extraordinary decision. He declared that Solidarity would try to form a government with the two parties.

The announcement electrified Poland. Within a few weeks, the communist government was ousted.

The shift from communism was not inevitable. It required individuals willing to take bold steps. Without Walesa, the former electrician whose resourcefulness as a politician was untapped until he assumed leadership, Solidarity might have died at birth. Without playright Vaclav Havel, jailed repeatedly in the 1980s, Czechoslovakia would have lacked a moral leader to spearhead its revolt. And without Ronald Reagan, an ardent anti-communist, America might have lacked a leader determined to reverse communist gains. Like ideas, individuals matter.

Mikhail Gorbachev's role is singular. Known early in life for his ideological zeal, Gorbachev proved to be extraordinarily flexible. Unlike other Soviet leaders, Gorbachev had seen free-market economies up close. In the late 1960s, he and his wife Raisa rented a car and spent weeks driving around France and Italy. He had to be astonished at the wealth he saw, especially in agricultural products. While his predecessors had stared at the decay of communism and stuck with the status quo, Gorbachev did not.

His motive—to keep the Communist Party in power—is conventional. But his methods are not. He sharply curtailed state terror, communism's traditional means of maintaining order, and allowed criticism (though sometimes not of himself) and elections. He sought to uproot the authority of party hacks. He informed communist leaders in Eastern Europe that they couldn't rely on the Soviet army to keep control. In similar circumstances, Khrushchev and Brezhnev had unleashed their troops.

Despite many eager declarations, the Cold War is not over. Communism is on the ropes, but with a zombie-like momentum it thrashes on.

There has been little evidence of any real contraction in Soviet military power. Soviet espionage is at a worldwide high. Soviet-made weapons continue to pour into Cuba and Nicaragua and find their way from there to El Salvador.

The goal now for America and its allies should be free economies and open elections in every communist nation. As one Romanian revolutionary put it: "You cannot have a free-market economy without a democracy, and you cannot have a democracy without a free-market economy."

When people who have experienced the catastrophic failures of the communist system—in economic and human terms—are all allowed to vote, communism will indeed be relegated to the ash heap of history.

TRIBUTE TO MAJ. GEN. JOHN WHELAN KIELY

HON. RONALD K. MACHTLEY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor an outstanding member of my district who is retiring after 47 years of dedicated and loyal service to this Nation.

Maj. Gen. John Whelan Kiely began his career in 1943 by enlisting in the U.S. Army. Commissioned as a second lieutenant in 1944, General Kiely served until 1946 where he held the distinction of being the youngest officer in the 75th Division. His subsequent commands from 1952 to 1955 included company commander and battalion adjutant in the 351st Regiment, Trieste FTT and as adjutant for the 6th Regiment in Berlin. From 1957 to 1959, General Kiely served as commander for the 1st Ranger Battalion. He graduated from the Naval War College in Newport, RI, in 1960 and in 1963 he became chief of plans, office director of Army budget.

He graduated from the Army War College in 1968 and was assigned to the Military Assistance Command in Vietnam. Upon his return, General Kiely served in the office comptroller of the Army at many distinguished levels including assistant director of the Army budget. In 1977, the U.S. Senate confirmed him as brigadier general in the Army National Guard. In 1983, General Kiely was appointed the adjutant general of Rhode Island and commanding general of the Rhode Island National Guard and promoted to the grade of major general.

General Kiely has served his country both in times of war and peace, earning several decorations and medals. Among these are the Purple Heart Medal, a Bronze Star with Valor Device and Oak Leaf Cluster, the Legion of Merit Medal with two Oak Leaf Clusters, and the Rhode Island Star. General Kiely has truly earned the respect of his fellow officers through his outstanding and distinguished record.

General Kiely has also been active in his community outside of his career. He is a member of the Knights of Columbus, the Rhode Island Historical Society, and commissioner of the Narragansett Council for the Boy Scouts of America. He has shared his career with his wife Marilyn of 41 years and he has three children.

On this occasion of his retirement, I extend my congratulations to John and his family and wish them both continued success and best wishes for the future.

A TRIBUTE TO DESMOND BUTLER

HON. JIM SAXTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a constituent whose efforts with today's youth have insured the continued understanding of the fundamental principles and values of our democratic institutions.

Desmond Butler, a teacher at Rancocas Valley Regional High School in Mount Holly, NJ, has demonstrated dedication to the improvement of the civic education of the State's youth. His coordination of the "We the People * * * Bicentennial Programs on the Constitution and Bill of Rights," including the National Bicentennial Competition, its non-competitive companion program, Congress and the Constitution, and the National Historical Pictorial Map Contest in the 13th Congressional District, are examples of his dedication.

Because he cares enough to volunteer, thousands of students of all ages have been afforded the opportunity to study the bicentennial program's curriculum, which introduces students to the philosophical ideas of our Founders, the historical background of the Philadelphia Convention, and the issues and debates that shaped the writing of our constitution. Students learn how our Government is organized and how it protects the rights and liberties of all citizens. Most important, they learn of the responsibilities which accompany the rights of citizenship in a democracy.

I call on my colleagues in the House to join with me, and the people of New Jersey's 13th District, in extending our gratitude and appreciation to Desmond Butler for his impressive contributions to the development of competent and responsible citizenship.

INTRODUCTION OF THE ZUNI CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT OF 1990

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to announce today the introduction of the Zuni Claims Settlement Act of 1990. This bill will settle out of court two lawsuits which the Zuni Tribe has filed against the United States for allegedly causing, through mismanagement, severe damage to the Zuni Indian Reservation in the State of New Mexico. The Zuni Tribe has agreed to compromise the lawsuits for the sum of $25 million which is approximately 50 cents on the dollar for claimed damages.

This settlement is unique in that it provides that the money received by the Zuni Tribe in the compromise of claims will be used for land conservation projects under the control and direction of the tribe. The bill provides for the money to be put into a trust fund. After the tribe's obligations are paid, only the interest on the fund can be spent pursuant to a Zuni Reservation restoration plan. This legislation establishes a mechanism which will assure these funds are expended in a calculated and effective manner which will directly benefit the tribe and its lands.

Instead of spending more valuable time and money trying to determine ultimate responsibility for the damages to the Zuni Reservation in the Court of Claims, the Zuni Tribe and the Department of Interior will work together to solve continuing erosion problems.

The Zuni people and the residents of the State of New Mexico will be the beneficiaries of the far-sighted settlement. I wish to personally congratulate and thank the Governor and Tribal Council of the Zuni Pueblo, the superintendent of the Zuni agency and the Albuquerque area director of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for working out a compromise which will be of lasting value to this and future generations.

The Zuni people themselves will be the key to the future success of erosion control on the reservation. This bill will enable labor intensive projects of reseeding and reforestation of the watershed areas to be funded in perpetuity. The building of check dams and other erosion control measures will be closely monitored and supervised with technical expertise provided by the Zuni Tribe and the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

This is an important milestone in the history of the Zuni Reservation. I encourage my colleagues to support this measure and I look forward to working with all interested parties to assure the Zuni Claims Settlement Act of 1990 becomes a reality this year.

PROTECTING THE RIGHTS OF NONSMOKERS AND DEFENDING AGAINST NEW EFFORTS TO ENCOURAGE SMOKING

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, last Sunday—February 25, 1990—was the first day of an expanded ban on smoking on airlines. We've come a long way. In 1973, the Civil Aeronautics Board first issued regulations that all airlines provide separate seating for smokers and nonsmokers. Then, in 1988, Congress prohibited smoking on all domestic flights of less than 2 hours. The smoking ban now applies to all flights of up to 6 hours, which includes all but a few domestic flights to Alaska and Hawaii.

Since the Surgeon General first reported on the risks of lung cancer from smoking cigarettes in 1964, smoking has been shown to be a devastating addiction that increases the risk of cancer, heart attack, strokes and other diseases in smokers. We now know that smoking also increases health risks for nonsmokers. As many as 5,000 Americans die each year from inhaling second-hand cigarette smoke. One scientific study after another has confirmed that cigarette smoke endangers the health of those who happen to inhale it. The dangers of cigarette smoke are most acute for smokers and for nonsmokers who breathe the smoke of others in confined spaces. Most vulnerable, however, are the very young and the very old.

After sparing no expense in mounting their campaign against the airline smoking ban, tobacco companies are now mounting a new and more serious war. It is a war against another vulnerable group—our Nation's young people.

Mr. Speaker, the risk of smoking for both smokers and nonsmokers are issues of concern that cross political lines. Recently, two political commentators, George Will and Carl Rowan, agreed that targeted marketing by the tobacco companies is reprehensible. I urge my colleagues in the Congress to consider the thoughtful views of these two excellent commentators, and I ask that they be placed in the RECORD:

TOBACCO'S TARGETS

(By George F. Will)

While you read this column, three Americans will die of smoking-related illnesses. Not surprising, considering that in 1986 the surgeon general reported, among other horrific things, benzene concentrations in cigarettes up to 2,000 times greater than the amounts that caused Perrier water to be pulled from markets worldwide. What is surprising, and will flabbergast future generations, is that public policy is so flaccid regarding the nation's foremost cause of preventable death.

Policy may become more muscular in the aftermath of an anomalous controversy, one concerning a major corporation's attempts to market in a normal way a legal, indeed a subsidized, product. The product is addictive (80 percent of adults using it want to quit; two-thirds have tried and failed), sickening and often lethal when used as it is intended to be used.

Today's subject is cigarettes, and the task, not exactly chivalric, is one of protecting "virile females." These women have various attributes, but the one most lovely to R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. is that they are minimally educated.

According to a company marketing memo, virile females are 18 to 20, have no education beyond high school, work in entry-level service or factory jobs, wear jeans and knit tops, watch "Roseanne, enjoy such events as motorcycle races, tractor pulls and monster truck competitions. Virile females are the market segment targeted by the new brand "Dakota," which may be promoted by Dakota-sponsored "Nights of the Living Hunks" and male strip shows.

Reynolds recently retreated from a plan to test-market a brand, "Uptown," targeted at blacks in inner cities, a group that already smokes much more than whites. (Billboards—advertisements that cannot be turned off or otherwise avoided—hawking cigarettes are concentrated most heavily in inner cities.)

Tobaccco companies bring a chilly clarity to the task of coping with a shrinking market. They use sophisticated marketing like a sniper's rifle, drawing beads on the most vulnerable, manipulable Americans. The rate of smoking is two-and-a-half times as high among Americans who have not finished high school as among college graduates.

America pays $52 billion annually—$221 per American—in health care, insurance costs and lost productivity because of tobacco, which every year kills more Americans than World War II did. The toll from tobacco is far higher than from cocaine, crack and heroin combined. One thousand deaths a day, one every 90 seconds. If an industrial accident killed everyone in the Augusta, Ga., metropolitan area, the nation would be horrified. That is the scale of the annual tobacco disaster.

Last week, Sen. Edward Kennedy chaired a spirited hearing that considered, among other good ideas, Sen. Bill Bradley's proposal to deny tax deductions for tobacco advertising—$2.5 billion of it annually. The companies, spending $6.9 million a day on advertising and promotions, cheekily claim it is all aimed at winning market shares, and none of it is aimed at children.

But about half of all smokers start by the time they are 15; few start after 21. Only 10 percent of smokers switch brands in a year. Death and intelligence cost the cigarette companies 6,000 customers a day. That many new smokers must be found daily to keep the companies running in place.

Cigarette advertising plays upon teenagers' desire for autonomy and anxiety about social acceptance and sexual allure. If just 3 percent of cigarette sales are to underage children, that market segment spends $1 billion, giving the companies $150 million in profits.

New smokers are disproportionately women and minorities. Forty years ago, just 3 percent of women with cancer had lung cancer. Now 20 percent do.

You say cigarette advertising is off television? Look again. Cigarette signs are in most of the key television camera sight lines in sports arenas and stadiums. On NBC's 93-minute telecast of the 1989 Marlboro Grand Prix, there were 4,997 images of Marlboro signs, 519 of Marlboro billboards and 249 of the Marlboro car. The brand name was visible 46 of the 93 minutes—49 percent of the telecast.

Targeted marketing, a common tactic, is now considered disgusting when the targeted group is picked because it is badly educated and informed, and hence manipulable, and the product being marketed is injurious. But senior executives who set the tobacco companies' marketing strategies do not have daughters who fit the "virile female" profile.

One wonders: Do the executives' daughters smoke? If so, are the executives pleased? If so, are they not strange parents?

SULLIVAN'S CRUSADE

(By Carl T. Rowan)

Hallelujah! You and I can fly from one end of America to the other today without having to breathe any of that "Uptown" cigarette smoke targeted at blacks, or that "Dakota" smoke that the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. planned to market among "virile white women." Fact is, you won't have your sinuses and lungs befouled by anyone else's smoke of any kind, because this is the day when the "no smoking" light stays on permanently during some 18,000 flights within the 48 contiguous states.

But that is not the important tobacco story of this time. The news is that Secretary of Health and Human Services Louis W. Sullivan has gone on an anti-tobacco crusade, bringing the Bush administration closer to a posture of honesty in its war on plants that kill people.

For years the United States has had the audacity to tell farmers in other countries they couldn't grow poppies or coca plants because someone would turn those crops into heroin and cocaine and make it possible for millions of Americans to destroy themselves. At the same time, the U.S. government was knuckling under to farmers in the U.S. tobacco states and to the tobacco lobby, even to the point of subsidizing tobacco crops that would produce emphysema, lung cancer and other life-shortening diseases for millions of Americans.

The United States has provoked snickers and outrage in recent days because of the revelation of a scheme to unleash the "drug bug"—the voracious malumbia caterpillar—on the coca crops of Peru, Bolivia, Colombia or any other neighboring countries.

The caterpillar caper would have looked even more outrageous than it does if Sullivan had not been on Capitol Hill saying that he was "troubled, outraged" that the tobacco industry is targeting ads at "women, minorities and young people." Sullivan spoke in the context of a campaign launched by Sen. Edward Kennedy to create a federal agency that would regulate tobacco products the way the Food and Drug Administration regulates medicines and certain food products.

While Sullivan did not endorse the Kennedy proposal, he gave it a push by releasing a report showing that smoking costs the nation $52 billion in health-care costs and lost productivity every year. Sullivan said tobacco products cause more than 15 percent of all deaths in this country, with some 390,000 Americans dying of smoke-related illnesses last year.

Sullivan should be commended for adding nicotine to the list of the "dopes" that American are trying to banish.

There are, of course, millions of people in the tobacco industry who are screaming that "the government is trying to take away my source of livelihood."

That is, verbatim, what the impoverished coca-growing farmers of the Andean nations are saying.

CONGRESSIONAL TRIBUTE TO KENNETH AND MEREDITH RODMAN

HON. ELTON GALLEGLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. GALLEGLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to two of the most committed and tireless volunteers I know, Ken and Meredith Rodman of Westlake Village, CA. For the past 13 years, Ken and Meredith have volunteered their time and talents for countless clubs and organizations in the Conejo Valley, but have been especially important to the success of projects for the Jewish community.

Among their many activities, they have together chaired the Conejo Valley division of the United Jewish Fund for the past 5 years, represented the Conejo Valley on the San Fernando Valley Region Jewish Federation Council board and executive committee, and planned and implemented the 1989 Conejo Valley Jewish community survey.

Individually, they have served the Jewish Federation and Temple Etz Chaim in many other capacities, and have served in volunteer capacities in civic and school organizations. To honor their achievements and dedication, Ken and Meredith were presented with the inaugural Jewish Community Service Award on Sunday. It was richly deserved.

Mr. Speaker, President Bush referred to Americans serving their communities as a thousand points of light. By any reckoning, Ken and Meredith Rodman are two of the brightest stars in that firmament. I am sure my colleagues join me today in honoring their many contributions to their community, and to the spirit of voluntarism that helped make this country great.

WILLIAM E. TOLMAN HIGH SCHOOL CELEBRATING ITS 135TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. RONALD K. MACHTLEY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, today it is my distinct pleasure to honor the students, alumni, teachers, and administrators of William E. Tolman High School which is celebrating its 135th anniversary this year.

Since 1855, Tolman High has been proudly serving the city of Pawtucket, RI. Tolman High has produced many great men and women for that community and for our Nation. Tolman High is known in the community as an exemplary school for preparing young men and women for the future. Tolman High sets high standards of excellence for all its members both inside and outside of the classroom. Tolman High also seeks to instill its students with the qualities needed to become productive citizens.

I am especially proud to recognize the school for its long tradition as an educational institution at a time when quality education is the primary need of our Nation. Tolman High has provided a guarantee for the future of our Nation for 135 years. I wish the school and its community continued success in the years to come.

A SALUTE TO UNITY DAY

HON. H. JIM SAXTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to pay tribute to an organization dedicated to laying the foundation for true cultural understanding.

The Strength to Love Outreach Ministry of Mount Holly, NJ has created a program which will help us all to meet the social and racial challenges before us and lead us into the 21st century. The diversity of cultures being encountered by all citizens of this great American melting pot presents the opportunity for greater cultural awareness for all.

Many Burlington County residents will benefit from the presentation of Unity Day, being held at the Holbein School Wednesday, February 28. The program includes speeches, poetry readings and musical presentations designed for the cultural enrichment of the whole community.

The Rev. Eric Johnson, pastor of the Strength to Love Church of Mount Holly, believes the key to eradicating racism and promoting tolerance and understanding among all people lies in the hands of youth. The Strength to Love Outreach Ministry plans to make the concepts presented at Unity Day part of a national thrust toward education through the creation of academic learning centers at which members of many cultural backgrounds will have the opportunity to interact and share life experiences.

I applaud the concept of Unity Day and the work of the Strength to Love Outreach Ministry as means to convey interracial and cultural understanding to those who can make a difference.

TAMMY TUCKER: PALM BEACH COUNTY'S BRIGHT AND SHINING STAR

HON. TOM LEWIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. LEWIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, each and every day we are exposed to an aspect to the drug war. Some days give us hope while other days bring us despair. It is hope that we hold on to as we work to bring our Nation together as we fight this war.

Today, I would like to share with you a part of the hope we cling to in Palm Beach County. That hope was found in the life of Tammy Tucker. He has since passed on but left a bright and shining path for our children to follow.

Tammy's work was consuming and the impact enormous. He established "No Dope" days and a "Rap-a-thon" in an attempt to keep our kids off drugs. His efforts in Palm Beach County were outstanding. More importantly, we can count on Tammy Tucker's work to provide a clear direction for our youth.

I hope you will join with me in saluting this bright and shining star of Palm Beach County.

FIGHTING THE SCOURGE OF ANTI-SEMITISM

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, as many of my colleagues and I have noted in the Congress, the dramatic and welcome changes in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe have brought with them some unwelcome changes as well. The most disturbing is the rise of anti-Semitism, particularly in the Soviet Union, but in many cases in some of the countries of Eastern Europe as well.

It is important, Mr. Speaker, that we in the Congress express our unequivocal opposition to these renewed and very disturbing manifestations of racism in the Soviet Union. Earlier this week, there were press reports that Soviet prosecutors were beginning to take action against the most unsavory of these manifestations. While we welcome and applaud these official Soviet actions, it is important for us here in the Congress to make known our strong opposition to anti-Semitism. I have introduced House Concurrent Resolution 264 condemning anti-Semitism in the Soviet Union. I urge my colleagues to join in cosponsoring this legislation.

The New York Times recently published an excellent column by Flora Lewis, "The Old Russian Scourge," which discusses the rise of anti-Semitism and which is a particularly useful summary of the rise of this ugly phenomenon. Mr. Speaker, I ask that Ms. Lewis' fine column be placed in the RECORD, and I urge my colleagues to give it thoughtful attention.

THE OLD RUSSIAN SCOURGE

PARIS.—Among the ugly costs of Communist rule was the failure to keep pace with revulsion at the ancient disease of anti-Semitism, let alone create a new mentality, as boasted. So a side effect of advancing release from repression in the East is revival of slogans of hate.

They have appeared openly in parts of Eastern Europe in this year of budding democracy. But the most ominous have come in the Russian heartland, where a combination of deliberate attempts to stir provocative disorder and atavistic prejudice are bringing old demons to the surface.

It was not unforeseen. As much as three years ago, Jews in Moscow told me of signs of renewed persecutions. Gorbachev reformers warned of a coalition of Communist hard-liners clinging to their privilege and anti-Communist nationalists exalting the mystical "purity" of Mother Russia.

Last weekend the Leningrad schoolteacher Nina Andreyeva, dubbed the "Pasionaria of the conservatives," earned rousing applause at a Moscow rally denouncing Mikhail Gorbachev and company, crying, "Long live the unity of patriotic and socialist forces." Le Monde's correspondent Bernard Guetta translated it accurately to mean "Long live national-Communism," a reminder of an aggressive German movement called National Socialism.

The anguish expressed at the prospect of a unified German state comes in part from neighbors' concern at a new dimension of economic and political power in the center of Europe. But more, it stems from the livid memory of the Nazis and their calculated inhumanity. At this point in history, there is more reason to worry about the infection of anti-Semitism farther East. It remains endemic.

For the first time, the Gorbachev regime has opened a criminal investigation of the organization Pamyat, which means memory, for violation of the law against "incitement to hatred and to national and racial conflict." It clearly represents a decision that more would be lost by ignoring Pamyat's anti-Semitic campaign than by a publicized prosecution.

The challenge was flagrant. There were not only speakers at Ms. Andreyeva's rally listing Jewish names as the source of Soviet ills. There was not only the incursion of Pamyat members at a Moscow meeting of liberal writers last month, shouting "Jews, Freemasons out—next time we'll come with machine guns."

There was an underground pamphlet, finally published by Moscow's Institute of Energy to show how bad things were, demanding that "Jews and their relations be forbidden to submit theses, to acquire academic degrees and knowledge, to join the Soviet Communist Party, to be elected to the Soviets, and to be named to leading positions in the party, the state elsewhere." It still took urgent insistence by reformist newspapers such as Literaturnaya Gazeta and Moscow News to move the prosecutor's office to act.

In Romania, vandals attacked a synagogue in the town of Oradea last week. In Hungary, an undercurrent of anti-Semitism is being exploited by nationalists in the campaign for free elections in March. A noted Western economist was told she couldn't join the board of a new Budapest joint venture because she was Jewish.

The Catholic Primate of Poland last year spoke abusively of Jews during the dispute about the convent at Auschwitz. Now, at last, work has evidently started on a new building site, and the Solidarity-led Polish Government has "deplored" the officially inspired anti-Semitic campaign that forced thousands of Jews to emigrate in 1968, offering return of citizenship to all. Diplomatic relations are being restored with Israel.

There are only a few thousand Jews left in Poland. But the point is that it takes deliberate will and effort to expunge a mental scourge, as it does to establish democracy. In Spain, the Government has signed an agreement giving Jewish and Protestant religions equal status with Catholics for the first time since the expulsion of Jews in 1492, and it is prepared for a similar accord with Moslems. Spain has been an inspiring example for the East in showing it is possible to move from dictatorship to democracy.

Mr. Gorbachev has opened the way for mass emigration of Jews. But it is no gain for the creation of a civil society in his country for them to be driven out. Overcoming anti-Semitism is another test of his "new thinking" and his system's capacity for reform. It's another way in which Communism fell behind, and another reason to urge him to get on with democracy and guaranteed human rights.

TRIBUTE TO EAGLE SCOUT BRIAN PARKER

HON. RONALD K. MACHTLEY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Eagle Scout Brian Parker. Brian earned the rank of Eagle Scout while he was a member of Troop 10 in Lincoln, RI.

The process of becoming an Eagle Scout is a hardship which tests the fiber of the young men who take the challenge. Brian's perseverance and accomplishment lift him above the ordinary. Brian has displayed the courage, discipline, and leadership which forms the backbone of our Nation.

I wish to offer my congratulations to Brian and hope that he will continue to strive toward the goals he has established as a Boy Scout.

RECIPROCITY IN INTERNATIONAL GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT ACT OF 1990

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself and our distinguished ranking minority member, Mr. HORTON, as well as Mr. BUSTAMANTE, I am, today, introducing legislation which will amend the Buy American Act of 1933 by requiring that any public interest waiver of that act meet with the approval of the U.S. Trade Representative.

I believe that this legislation is necessary to strengthen our negotiating position in the current renegotiation of the International Government Procurement Code. This legislative approach is the result of concerns raised at a hearing of the Legislation and National Security Subcommittee which was held on September 24, 1989. At that time, the subcommittee reviewed the implementation of the Buy American Act of 1989 and the operation of international procurement agreements.

As my colleagues know, the International Government Procurement Code is designed to eliminate procurement barriers to market access by extending equal treatment to foreign and domestic suppliers for Government purchases under the Code. Twenty countries, including the United States, are Code signatories. However, the provisions of the Code do not apply to procurement indispensable for national security or for national defense purposes. In addition, telecommunications, heavy electrical and transportation procurement are excluded.

It is estimated that only 10 to 20 percent of all Government procurement is covered by the Code and the vast majority of contracts and dollar value—about 80 percent—are opportunities provided by U.S. Government procurement. However, at our September hearing the General Accounting Office reported that little progress had been made in expanding covered procurements and the United States was at a 4-to-1 disadvantage in sales opportunities under the Code.

As we have attempted to expand Code coverage in other areas where billions of potential sales opportunities with foreign governments for U.S. firms exist, it appears that defense trade agreements which have been negotiated outside of the Code may be complicating our ability to make progress in nondefense sectors. Under the so-called Reciprocal Memorandums of Understanding [MOU's], the Department of Defense has waived the Buy American Act. The practical effect of this has been to open up between 50 percent and 80 percent of U.S. Government procurement to those nations with whom we maintain bilateral MOU's. Unlike the Procurement Code, the MOU's provide for no specified procedures whereby U.S. contractors are assured information about prospective procurements. Thus, in exchange for access to a substantial share of our procurement market, we receive only a pledge of reciprocal access. This situation must change.

The problems such arrangements may cause to our larger trade goals was indicated at our hearing when the GAO in testimony on its review of international procurement issues for the subcommittee pointed out the following:

"* * * when you take into account the fact that roughly 80 percent of our procurement is defense procurement, when you take into account the fact that maybe as much as 80 percent of covered procurements under the Government Procurement Code are also covered under the reciprocal MOUs, I would say failure to link the defense reciprocal MOUs with what we are trying to achieve under the Government Procurement Code would probably weaken our hand.

"We are basically giving a lot of benefits under the reciprocal MOUs. However, we want things from foreign governments that don't fall under the MOUs. * * * so I think from a policy perspective * * * it seems to make better sense to try to link the two if we are going to have a better shot at achieving our trade policy objectives with respect to government procurement."

Mr. Speaker, the bill we are introducing today will do that. The Congress has attempted several times in the past to persuade, cajole, and otherwise nag the Department of Defense into looking at the broader trade and competitiveness implications in its defense trade agreements without much success. The world is changing too rapidly to disregard the fundamental fact that national security can no longer be defined purely in military terms. We must give our Government the tools to assert our international economic interest and end a situation where the trade policy of the United States has many conflicting voices within the executive branch. Such coordination can also assist in recognizing the rise of Government procurement opportunities in Eastern Europe which has recently shed the ideological straitjacket of communism. And it will certainly put us in a better position to deal with the economic challenges as well as exploit the opportunities presented by economic integration of the European Community in 1992.

I also wish to inform my colleagues that the Government Operations Committee intends to continue to perform intense oversight over the implementation of the Buy American Act of 1988, a very significant part of the 1988 Omnibus Trade and Competitiveness Act. On April 30, 1990, the U.S. Trade Representative will be reporting to the Congress on foreign government procurement discrimination. I am today announcing that hearings will be held on that report by the Legislation and National Security Subcommittee. The legislation which we have introduced today will, I hope, play an important role in the consideration of this important report to Congress.

Finally, I want to encourage my colleagues to cosponsor this legislation and look forward to early hearings by our subcommittee.

CONGRESSIONAL TRIBUTE TO DR. GEORGE RATHMANN

HON. ELTON GALLEGLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. GALLEGLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor Dr. George Rathmann, the chairman of AMGEN Inc., and a strong supporter of research into kidney disease. As my colleagues may know, AMGEN, headquartered in Thousand Oaks, CA, is a pioneer in the exciting new field of biotechnology, a field that promises to revolutionize medicine. Indeed, biotechnology is doing so already.

But in addition to his challenging work with AMGEN, George is a strong supporter of research into the treatment of anemia associated with chronic kidney disease. For those efforts, the National Kidney Foundation of southern California is honoring him with a testimonial dinner on March 11.

Thanks to people like George Rathmann, the Kidney Foundation is able to continue its research to find the cause and cure of kidney and urological diseases and to attempt to enrich the quality of life for millions of Americans who suffer from renal failure—850,000 in southern California alone.

Mr. Speaker, I'm sure my colleagues join me in paying tribute to Dr. George Rathmann, and acknowledging his contributions to medicine.

THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF CHANNEL ISLANDS NATIONAL PARK

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, March 5, 1990, marks the 10th anniversary of the Channel Islands National Park. It was on this date in 1980 that President Carter signed Public Law 96-199, establishing the Nation's 40th national park on the islands of Santa Cruz, Santa Rosa, Santa Barbara, San Miguel, and Anacapa off the coast of Ventura and Santa Barbara Counties in California.

These islands, which are the seaward extension of the Santa Monica Mountains, encapsule a unique marine and coastal environment. Because of their isolation from the mainland, they have remained relatively untouched, to the point where they have evolved several unique species and subspecies of plants and animals. They provide a refuge for many endangered marine mammals and birds, including sea elephants, sea lions, and seals, and their waters provide part of the annual migration route of the California Gray Whale.

Before the arrival of European explorers, the islands were used by the Chumash Indians, and artifacts may still be found there. "Discovered" by Portuguese explorer Juan Rodriguez Cabrillo on his voyage of discovery under the Spanish flag in 1542, the islands have remained in a relatively undeveloped state. Cabrillo himself has been reported to have been buried there. Today they remain as islands in time, representing what the southern California coastline was like in centuries past.

Mr. Speaker, there are many people involved in any undertaking as involved as creating a national park, and I will name only a few today. Recent owners of the islands, including the last Dr. Carey Stanton, the Gherini family, the Vail family, the Nature Conservancy, and the U.S. Navy, all played a role in preserving this unique resource.

My own interest and concern for the islands was sparked—like many others I know—by Dr. Stanton's gracious hospitality over the years at his home on Santa Cruz Island. His love for the islands, and his determination to preserve them for future generations, was a key factor in the creation of the park. It was with his encouragement that, following the disastrous oil well blowout in the channel in 1969, I introduced legislation creating an oil-free sanctuary on the State tidelands surrounding the islands. Then-Gov. Ronald Reagan signed the bill into law, providing a key element of protection to the islands. At the same time, my colleague, the late Congressman Charles Teague, successfully lobbied for the creation of a Federal ecological preserve and buffer zone off the Santa Barbara coast.

In 1979, following my own election to Congress, I introduced legislation in the House of Representatives, H.R. 2975, establishing the Channel Islands National Park. A key element in the progress of the legislation was Dr. Stanton's agreement to deed the major portion of Santa Cruz Island to the Nature Conservancy under very generous terms, an agreement facilitated by a timely grant of funds from ARCO.

Another key element was the enduring work and testimony of Bill Ehorn—superintendent of the Channel Islands National Monument and superintendent of the park itself until last year—who provided much of the motive power toward passage. The U.S. Navy contributed by its position on the legislation, a very generous decision on its part; the Navy continues to be helpful. And the many local residents who supported creation of the park—the people of Ventura and Santa Barbara Counties—all share in the credit for its passage.

Finally, I cannot end this tale without reporting the contribution of the late Representative Phil Burton, then-chairman of the House Subcommittee on National Parks and Insular Affairs, on which I served then as now. Phil, whose persuasive powers are legend in this House, agreed to roll my bill into an omnibus parks bill he was pushing. The juggernaut swept through the House on the suspension calendar, passed the Senate by a vote of 67 to 6, and on George Washington's Birthday was sent to the President, who signed the bill on March 5, 1980.

And so it was that the home of Santa Cruz Island fox, the giant coreopsis, the brown pelican, the sea elephants, and the gray whale—"discovered" over time by the Chumash, by Cabrillo, by the Spanish Rancheros, and then the Americans—today lies off our coast as a permanent legacy to our own and future generations, a lasting preserve for the grandeur and glory of nature at its finest: the Channel Islands National Park.

Mr. Speaker, it is with a grateful mixture of both humility and pride that I extend to the citizens of Ventura and Santa Barbara Counties, to the National Park Service, to Mack Shaver, the current superintendent and his dedicated staff, to Fran Carter and the Friends of the Channel Islands National Park, and to all those individuals—named and unnamed, including my staff—who played a part in making this park a reality, the very best wishes and congratulations of the U.S. House of Representatives on the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the Channel Islands National Park.

May there be many more.

A TRIBUTE TO TWO NEW MEXICO FIRMS FOR SBA REGION AWARDS

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize two firms in New Mexico who were recently awarded the Small Business Administration Region Awards.

MicroSage, which is based in Los Alamos and owned by Mitchell Chi and Vincent Nicolosi, has been named the Small Business Subcontractor of the Year in a 5-State region including New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas. MicroSage trains individuals to use computer software at Los Alamos National Laboratory. It also does consulting work and within the last 2 years, has opened a retail computer store in Los Alamos.

MicroSage was awarded a contract with Los Alamos laboratories last fall to supply harddisk drives and storage systems for computers in addition to their training more than 3,000 laboratory employees, from scientists to secretaries. Their success comes from going above and beyond contract requirements by spending the extra time needed so that each student completely understands the training.

S. Systems Corp. of Albuquerque has been named the 1990 Small Business Prime Contractor of the Year for the same region S. Systems is a Los Angeles-based firm owned by Troy Davis.

S. Systems provides engineering and technical services at the developmental Optics facility at the Air Force Weapons Laboratory at Kirtland Air Force Base. Working in support of the Lab's advanced radiation directorate laser program, S. Systems designs, fabricates and coats optics—lenses, mirrors and windows—primarily for two large research lasers at Kirtland.

Although S. Systems is a Los Angeles based firm its Albuquerque division received the SBA award. The Albuquerque division started in 1986 with a staff of four. Due to their superlative work and increase in business, they currently employ 24. S. Systems gets virtually all its business from the Air Force and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration and about 25 percent of the company's work here is related to the Strategic Defense Initiative, or star wars program.

I am pleased to commend MicroSage and S. Systems for their outstanding work in the computer and optics field, respectively, and as recipients of the 1990 Small Business Administration Region Awards.

TRIBUTE TO KEVIN PARKER

HON. RONALD K. MACHTLEY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding young man who has continued to excel at the highest level.

Kevin Parker, who already earned the rank of Eagle Scout while a member of Troop 10 in Lincoln, RI, has continued his mission as a Boy Scout. Kevin has earned the Silver Palm, an achievement which is among the highest that Boy Scouts can accomplish. Kevin has gone above and beyond the ordinary in his efforts and has displayed the qualities of courage and leadership for which our Nation stands.

I extend my congratulations to Kevin and I hope that he will continue to strive for excellence. His uncommon effort and achievement set outstanding examples that I hope others will follow.

REPAIRING EDUCATION

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, on February 8, 1990, the Allstate Insurance Company convened its third forum entitled "Labor Force 2000." Allstate brought together corporate and education leaders, government officials, and politicians from across the country to forge community-wide support networks for education.

The Allstate approach is based on two simple ideas. First, education is the most crucial element in America's economic strength. Second, our education systems can succeed only when business, schools, government, and the community work cooperatively to solve the real problems confronting education.

Mr. Speaker, Allstate is putting these ideas into practice. Through Labor Force 2000, businesses and educators are forming links that, I hope, will transcend their differences on education, and result in productive working relationships.

These forums are a first step toward repairing our Nation's educational achievement. Allstate is clearly making a difference.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert in the RECORD at this point remarks given by Wayne Hedien, chairman and CEO of Allstate, at the the Labor Force 2000 Forum. I commend this speech to anyone concerned about education in this country.

REMARKS BY WAYNE E. HEDIEN, CHAIRMAN AND CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER, ALLSTATE INSURANCE CO.

Thank you.

There is a tradition of community involvement at Allstate.

It probably goes all the way back to our parent company, Sears Roebuck. A long time ago, Sears' legendary chairman Gen. Robert Wood said, "business must account for its stewardship, not only on the balance sheet, but also in matters of social responsibility."

We've tried to put that principle into practice in a number of ways.

Since 1951, for instance, the Allstate Foundation has been making significant contributions to worthwhile causes across the country.

As a corporation, we've also crusaded for safety on the highways, and in the home.

We've worked to increase the availability of affordable housing in urban neighborhoods.

We've helped promote health and fitness for all age groups in our society.

And above all, we've tried to lend a hand to our neighbors—whenever and however we can.

We even have an organization in Allstate called "Helping Hands," that supports the involvement of Allstate people in a wide variety of charitable projects.

I'm proud to say that three out of every four Allstate employees are active in these volunteer programs across the country—from community gardens . . . to special olympics . . . to seniors day celebrations.

So the idea of sharing our talents and resources with others is pretty well ingrained at Allstate. In fact, the commitment to society and community has been formally identified as one of four basic principles that guide the decision-making process in our company.

It's a priority right up there with our commitment to customers . . . to employees . . . and to quality in everything we do.

It's a commitment I personally support as Allstate's CEO.

But I don't think that makes me or my company unique.

For most leading corporations today, business as usual includes a dedication to corporate citizenship of the highest order.

In some ways, that represents a change from the prevailing attitudes of a century . . . or even a generation . . . ago.

But it's definitely a change for the better. And it's based on some very sound reasons.

In the first place, community involvement makes good business sense. Better fed, better housed, better educated employees make better workers.

And better communities make it easier to hire and retain them.

We've also learned that corporate social responsibility is good for our image. And a good image is absolutely essential in today's media-conscious environment.

But beyond these sometimes self-serving reasons, business gets involved in the community because this is America.

In Europe, for instance, companies traditionally aren't as active in civic and philanthropic affairs.

But in our pluralist and populist tradition, we believe that the ultimate aim of every institution must include serving the public interest.

That's true for government. It's true for nonprofit groups and community organizations. And it's true for business, too.

We have to pay our democratic dues just like everyone else.

But all that just helps explain why companies are involved with society in general.

What about the issue we are addressing today?

Why are corporations especially concerned with the future of America's schools?

And what can we do to help ensure the success of our joint efforts?

Let me briefly take a crack at answering those two questions.

First, why has business made the issue of education such a priority on its social agenda?

I think there are two reasons.

The first is simple self-preservation.

As we begin the '90s, businesspeople find themselves staring at double-barreled dilemma.

On the one hand, we're facing a severe labor shortage by the end of the decade.

Our population is increasing at a rate slower than in any era since the great depression. It's also getting older.

As a result, by the year 2000, the workforce will be growing at less than 1 per cent per year . . . while economists expect the GNP to be growing at something like 3 per cent annually.

But that's only part of the problem, because while we will have fewer workers to draw on . . . we will also be making more demands on them.

We may think that computers and cable TV already bombard us with too many facts. But as the information age unfolds, tomorrow's workers will have to know more than ever—about all kinds of things.

And it's not just raw knowledge they'll need. After all, microchips can shrink centuries of learning down into circuits smaller than your thumbnail.

But in a world where change is the rule, rather than the exception, what we really need are people who know how to use the information at their fingertips.

That means we need people who can make connections . . . explore options. We need innovation and entrepreneurship.

So when business looks at the year 2000, we see a world where fewer workers . . . will have to exercise more creativity and initiative than ever before.

Employees and corporations will have to learn how to work harder and, above all, smarter!

Obviously, such a scenario suggests that CEOs and school superintendents alike should re-think the way we prepare ourselves and our people for the future.

Which brings me to my second reason why business has become so involved with education—because corporations and the schools face many of the same issues . . . and have many of the same goals.

Take the labor shortage I mentioned. The same demographic facts of life will also produce a student shortage.

Or take another issue—the increasing ethnic diversity of our student and employee population.

By the year 2000, more than 85 percent of all new employees entering the workforce will be minorities and women . . . while one out of every three American students will be members of minority groups.

For both our institutions, the real challenge will be to create environments that are truly "heterogeneous"—where people are neither advantaged nor disadvantaged because of their background . . . and where different people are encouraged to make the best possible use of their different talents.

One more common issue facing business and education is the globalization of industry and ideas.

We're moving closer and closer to a world marketplace. Europe 1992 . . . the emerging economies of the Eastern bloc and Pacific rim—all the signs point to greater economic interdependence in the future.

Meanwhile, we're also moving closer to a world culture. Fashions . . . music . . . the media—they look and sound familiar, whether you're in Tokyo . . . Turin . . . or Toledo.

Now, globalization creates opportunities as well as challenges.

But when more than half of all adult Americans can't find England or France on a map . . . and when the average American business school graduate knows about as much math as the average eighth grader in Japan . . . we're clearly not ready to become full-fledged citizens of the world.

So as executives and educators, we face many of the same issues. There are many ways we can learn from . . . and help . . . each other.

Which brings me to my second topic.

What can we do to ensure the success of our emerging business/education partnerships?

Well, at meetings like this, we usually focus on the external obstacles we face. Funding, logistics, bureaucracy.

But to paraphrase "Pogo" . . . when it comes to joint efforts by executives and educators . . . maybe the real enemy is us.

Because even though we both have an enormous stake in the success of our schools, we still approach education reform from different directions . . . and envision solutions largely from our own perspective.

That's something we don't often say out loud. But it's an observation that's reinforced by the results of surveys done over the past year in conjunction with this forum.

The first, you may remember, was conducted last year by Allstate and Fortune magazine. It questioned business leaders around the country—people like me, and my colleagues.

The second survey was conducted this year by our Allstate research center. It was co-sponsored by the American Association of School Administrators.

We asked many of the same questions as in the Fortune study. This time, though, we surveyed members of the education establishment—people like Dean Speicher and his colleagues.

Comparing responses to the two surveys revealed some interesting differences of opinion and perspective.

For instance, asked to grade the performance of American public education, Dr. Speicher's colleagues said the system was doing a pretty good job. They gave it a B−.

My colleagues said the performance was only fair, and gave it a C−.

Here is maybe an even more revealing result. More than half of the educators said America's school system is as good or better than Japan's.

More than nine out of ten executives thought ours is clearly worse.

But what about trends—where we've been, and where we're going?

Well, about three-fourths of the educators said they believe our public schools are better in 1990 than they were ten years ago.

About the same percentage expects them to improve during the coming decade, too.

Almost two out of three executives, on the other hand, said public education got worse—not better—during the '80s.

And less than half predicted any real improvement in the next ten years.

All right then, we asked, why are our schools having problems?

Here, Dr. Speicher's colleagues and business people did agree on several important factors—including lack of parental involvement . . . and poorly motivated students.

But there were significant differences, too. Educators, for instance, were more than twice as likely to place part of the blame on budget cuts . . .

While executives cited inadequately trained . . . low academic standards . . . and lack of emphasis on basic skills—again, twice as often as educators.

When asked what it would take to turn our schools around, we did get agreement on several key points.

Both educators and executives believe getting parents more involved . . . making teachers more accountable . . . and doing a better job of motivating students were key objectives.

Again, though, there were differences. Some you might not expect—for instance, executives were more likely than educators to propose bigger salaries and smaller classes for teachers.

But executives were also twice as likely to favor a greater emphasis on basic skills . . . and three times more supportive of parents' right to choose whatever schools seem best for their children.

Finally, when we asked what companies should do to help the schools, educators were inclined to suggest supporting tax increases . . . and contributing materials and equipment.

Executives favored contributing materials, too. But they were also more likely to mention donating money . . . manpower, in the form of employee lecturers and tutors . . . and giving part time jobs to students.

Now, based on these differing responses, I'm not saying who's right . . . or whose perspective makes more sense. In most cases, the answer probably lies somehwere in the middle.

But one thing is clear. What we have here is a real failure to communicate.

And it's costing us.

Look, for example, at the survey's final question. We asked, "overall, considering what you know about current involvement, how much difference do you think U.S. companies' efforts have made in the quality of the education provided by your area's public education system?"

Only about a fourth of the executives and educators said companies were having a real impact on the schools in their area.

More than half said they hadn't made a difference at all.

If that's true, it probably reflects the fact that business and education have been focusing on joint efforts for a relatively short time.

Our first forum, for instance, was only held a year ago. And we all know it can take large organizations a while to translate ideas into action.

But, if business isn't having a major impact on education, it also reflects the fact that . . . executives and educators still often see the world in different ways.

And it's hampering our efforts to get America's learning curve pointed in the right direction once again.

So what can we do about it?

It seems to me we have two choices.

We can draw a line in the dirt and say, "you stay on your side, and we'll stay on ours."

That's been our traditional approach. Oh, we've crossed over from time to time with programs like adopt-a-school. But basically, we've kept our distance.

That plan, however, hasn't really resolved some of the fundamental problems confronting American education.

Which is why we created this forum in the first place. We believed that if executives and educators want to be truly effective advocates for reform, we have to get past our preconceptions . . . and focus on the problems instead.

And we have to include others in the effort.

In other words, we need to rub out the line between us . . . draw a big circle instead . . . and invite everyone in.

As our first forum report makes clear, the best way to do all that is to tackle the issue where it matters most . . . and where we can do the most good—at the local level.

In just a few minutes, we'll hear examples of that principle in action.

The projects highlighted on this afternoon's program . . . and in the supplemental forum report you'll be receiving today . . . were based on a consensus that came from within the community—not just business or education . . . but all the constituencies concerned about our schools.

Their experience shows that when people of good will get together, something very powerful happens.

Talk to those involved and you'll find that parents and teachers . . . executives and administrators . . . government officials and civic leaders . . . don't have to sit down for very long before they find that the other guys have something to offer, too.

From there, it's possible to create a common agenda . . . and a shared strategy.

And from that vision, springs success.

So that's our first recommendation—the revolution begins with one school . . . one district . . . one town at a time, and everyone plays a part.

But there is also a need to support that kind of consensus at the State and national level, too.

To keep communicating between and among the various groups with a stake in America's educational future.

I'll tell you the truth—I think of myself as a person who's fairly aware of the issues facing education. I read the articles and the reports, like all of you do.

But I rarely get the chance to exchange ideas with people like Lauro Cavazos and Phil Swain . . . Dean Speicher and Al Shanker . . . Bob Jones and Jean McGrew . . . and the panelists that we've assembled for this afternoon.

And every time I do get the opportunity . . . Like today . . . I learn something. I see an issue in a different way. I think about a problem from another perspective.

In other words. I also get educated.

So what I'm proposing is a kind of continuing education program for educators . . . and executives . . . and everyone else interested in our schools.

An ongoing forum where we can share insights and suggestions. Where we can learn more about each other's proposal. Where we can clean the air, and take a fresh look at our options.

I don't know that form such a group should take. But I do know that it's necessary if we expect to achieve real and lasting education reform in America.

So I promise that Allstate will further explore the idea in conjunction with other groups and individuals.

And we'll report back to you with the results.

Let me leave you with one final thought.

This is our third such forum on education. And it's our biggest turnout yet.

Which suggests that more and more executives and educators understand the importance of such efforts.

We realize we must act together and soon.

Because we're not just talking about improving our productivity . . . or raising S.A.T. scores.

We're talking about improving our society . . . and raising our expectations for generations to come.

When my predecessor, Dick Haayen, opened the first Allstate forum on education, he talked about "the wealth of nations."

He said Adam Smith's concept of people as a country's most valuable asset has been best illustrated by the history of free enterprise in America.

But history is full of little ironies. Today, we find millions of workers in Eastern Europe demonstrating—and even dying—for that deal . . .

While back here at home, America goes on squandering its human resources by allowing our schools and our students to settle for less than the best.

Maybe it's time we took a cue from the folks over there.

In his first New Year's Day address last month, New Czechoslovakian President Vaclav Havel told his people that they were at least partially responsible for 40 years of communism because "(we) accepted it as an inalterable fact, and thereby kept it running."

The same might be said of us—if we accept substandard education as an inalterable fact . . . and thereby keep our schools running at a fraction of their potential.

As Charles DeGaulle—another European leader of an earlier generation—said: "People get the history they deserve."

Let's agree to do what's necessary today . . . so that a generation from now, history can say we gave the children of America the education they deserved.

Thank you. And good luck in your good work.

FOREIGN CONTRACTING AUDIT EQUITY ACT OF 1990

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Foreign Contracting Audit Equity Act of 1990. This legislation will correct a serious deficiency in our ability to protect U.S. tax dollars in the procurement of defense and other items from abroad.

The bill being introduced today would put audit requirements for U.S. firms and their foreign competitors on a level playing field. It will require foreign firms, when performing U.S. Government contracts, to open their books and records for audit purposes. Failure to respond to a subpoena for such records from the head of the U.S. Government agency making the procurement could trigger court action resulting in substantial penalties, including suspension of payments.

Congress took appropriate action in 1985 to outlaw what had become a practice of charging costs such as kennel fees, country club dues, advertising, and entertainment as part of overhead expenses for defense contracts. However, the Office of the Department of Defense inspector general's report last year on "Field Pricing Support and Postaward Audit of Contracts with Foreign Companies," reveals that we remain excessively vulnerable to such mischarges and overpricing when we contract with foreign firms providing goods to the U.S. Government.

The IG's extensive review supports the need for this legislation. It shows that hundreds of millions of dollars in potential reductions in defense contract costs are at stake. With billions of dollars being awarded each year to foreign firms by the Department of Defense, it is only fair that foreign firms be held to the same audit standards we apply to our own defense contractors. In addition, we must recognize that to accept lax enforcement of these standards, thereby paying for unallowable costs and overpricing, is undercutting our own international competitiveness by subsidizing foreign contractors. This is a form of "foreign aid" to foreign defense contractors that we cannot allow to continue.

Official Government policy, as directed by the Competition in Contracting Act and expressed in Federal Acquisition Regulations, is to acquire all goods and services on a competitive basis to the maximum extent possible. However, it is possible to have two or more suppliers for a product and still not have price competition. This occurs when factors such as technical design or performance, not price, dominate the source selection. Such "negotiated contracts," while still associated with competitive procedures, require the Government contracting officer to obtain accurate information on contractor costs.

When contractors fail to disclose relevant cost and pricing data with respect to such negotiated contracts, the Government may pay a higher price than warranted. The Truth in Negotiations Act of 1962 requires contractors and subcontractors to submit cost and pricing data on certain noncompetitive price proposals and to certify that the data submitted are accurate, complete, and current. It also provides for price reductions if it is later found—through post-award audits—that "defective" information significantly increased the price of the contract.

Such defective pricing reviews which rely on access to contractor records have proven to be extremely useful tools in reducing the cost of defense and other contracts to the Federal Government. The inspector general of the Department of Defense has stressed the importance of such audits stating that about $19 is saved for the Government for every $1 of audit effort. The DOD contracting organizations reported that last year, 554 significant postaward Defense Contract Audit Agency contract audit reports had challenged $1.6 billion in proposed contract costs. It is clear from these figures that such audits can make a substantial contribution toward reducing the cost of defense through tough but fair review of defense contractor pricing proposals.

But tough and fair review of pricing proposals of foreign contractors, in many instances, is impossible due to the inability of U.S. auditors to inspect records. And the foreign auditors trained to assist U.S. contracting officials do not provide adequate support in negotiations. Since the Department of Defense spends more than $10 billion per year in contracts and subcontracts abroad, the potential for savings is considerable.

It is important to understand that such a situation was never intended under current law or through international government procurement agreements on defense trade with our allies. On the latter point, while the United States has negotiated so-called reciprocal audit annexes with Canada, France, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom, and West Germany, it was never intended that U.S. audit standards would be waived. On the contrary, the specific purpose of such agreements was to train auditors from these countries to assist U.S. contracting officials in reviewing cost proposals in concluding negotiated contracts with foreign firms consistent with Federal acquisition regulations.

Unfortunately, these agreements are just not working. U.S. contracting officers are unable to obtain quality audit services on a timely basis. The allowability of millions of dollars of costs of foreign contracts have come into question. Yet, our ability to challenge these costs has been undercut by the failure of effective implementation of the audit agreements and inability of the Department of Defense to remedy the situation.

Testimony taken at a hearing last year by the Legislation and National Security Subcommittee, which I chair, clearly demonstrated these problems. In one example cited by the DOD IG, the profit margin for a sole source weapons contract to a foreign firm was reportedly increased to cover the cost of a contingent fee of more than $600,000 to a U.S. agent of the foreign contractor for "expedited mail services." Contingent fees to U.S. contractors are unallowable under Federal acquisition regulations. An official memo on this negotiation stated that the fee could approach $6 million if all contract options were exercised. Yet, it appears that the profit margin in the contract was increased to block a stalemate in negotiations. Was such a fee allowable and how much of the profit margin covered such costs? We don't know because we can't get a good audit.

In another instance, $12.7 million was charged by a foreign contractor in so-called "levies" which are defined as commercial exploitation charges despite the fact that a 1987 agreement established procedures allowing U.S. contracting officers to request waivers of such charges. These levies do nothing except add to the cost of the contract. The lack of audit support to U.S. contracting officers helped result in this overcharge to the American taxpayer.

Timeliness of foreign audits performed is also another area of deficiency. A review of timeliness of two audit reports by the Department of Defense inspector general found U.S. requested audit reviews delayed by no less than 5 months and for as long as 8 months. It has been noted that these audits were received only after the matter was raised to higher levels of the contracting command and the ministries of defense in the countries involved.

U.S. contracting officers considered the foreign audit reports to be unresponsive because they did not provide sufficient details. Overall, the DOD inspector general found 65 percent of the European audit reports unresponsive to the audit requests. Of specific concern was the lack of coverage of unallowable costs which are based on U.S. law and cannot be waived under any circumstances. The Federal acquisition regulations, part 31 states that certain costs including entertainment, contributions, bad debts, interest, and other financial costs will not be charged to U.S. Government contracts. These unallowable costs were not addressed more than 75 percent of the time by foreign auditors, raising concern that millions of dollars may have been inappropriately charged by foreign firms to U.S. defense contracts. Moreover, certain foreign government officials absolutely refused to check for such unallowable costs.

On the average, roughly 15 percent of negotiated contract costs are questioned by Defense Contract Audit Agency auditors in reviewing foreign contract proposals in Europe. The IG study which was the subject of our subcommittee's hearing found that the foreign audit work reviewed questioned an average of only 1.26 percent of proposed costs with some foreign auditors actually adding about 6 percent to the negotiated contract price proposals. Clearly, the potential for reducing the cost of foreign defense contracts through adequate pricing reviews is considerable. Had 15 percent of the $819 million in proposed costs which were reviewed been questioned, instead of 1.26 percent, over $121 million would have been on the table for negotiation. If only 50 percent of those challenged had been sustained, the U.S. taxpayers would have saved over $60 million. Had 15 percent of the $4.2 billion in negotiated contracts awarded to the countries reviewed in this report been subject to question, the potential cost reduction would have soared to $600 million. We can certainly ill afford to leave hundreds of millions of dollars in such potential cost reductions in U.S. contracts with foreign firms on the negotiating table.

The value of foreign procurement funded by tax dollars each year is in the billions of dollars. However, the current arrangements whereby U.S. contracting officers appear to be routinely refused adequate audit support continues to put at risk tens of millions, if not hundreds of millions, of taxpayer dollars. The Foreign Contracting Audit Equity Act will correct this situation. The Government Operations Committee's legislation and National Security Subcommittee will hold hearings on the bill in the next few weeks. I encourage my colleagues to support its enactment when it reaches the floor.

ST. CROIX PARISHIONERS AND STUDENTS PROVIDE INSPIRATION AFTER HURRICANE HUGO

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, the fury of Hurricane Hugo, whose 200-miles-per-hour winds caused enormous destruction in the U.S. Virgin Islands, also brought out the dedication and strength of many people in our community. Thousands of our people huddled together in darkness to survive the storm, then joined hands to work together in the sunlight to rebuild their homes, businesses, and lives.

Two such heroic groups are the students and teachers at St. Joseph's High School and the parishioners and clergy of St. Ann's Parish at Barrenspot on St. Croix. Whether they were praying together for sheer survival, or working together to rebuild classrooms and the parish center, these students and parishioners have been a model of dedication and community effort. Under the leadership of Bishop Sean O'Malley, they have been an inspiration to the Virgin Islands.

Brother James Petrait, who chairs the Science Department at St. Joseph's High School, has recorded the experience of living through Hurricane Hugo in two moving articles that I want to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so they will get the national attention they deserve. Brother James also has begun a "Seeds for New Life" campaign that is seeking donations of garden tools and seeds, as explained in the first article.

In reading Brother Petrait's articles, I am reminded of two fundamental facts that we, too, easily forget. First, the value of humility. When Mother Nature unleashes her full power, we human beings are just grass in the wind. Our power is like nothing compared to that of nature. Second, when destruction is overwhelming, it is most important that we thank God for life. The people of St. Joseph's and St. Ann's, who lost so much in material wealth, have found renewed strength and deep meaning in the simple blessing of life. That is a lesson for us all.

Two articles from the Pilot, the paper of the Boston Archdiocese, and the St. Croix Avis follow here:

THANK GOD FOR LIFE AND FRIENDS

(By Brother James A. Petrait, O.S.F.S.)

It has been several months since we experienced living through the eye of Hurricane Hugo on St. Croix and the effects of the terrible disaster are still with us. Many still have no homes or have severely damaged dwellings. Much of the island is still without electrical power, phone service, and running water. But we are rebuilding thanks to generous help of our friends in the States and elsewhere.

I remember well that September night of devastation when the eye of Hugo and its six tornadoes and winds of over 200 miles per hour near it hovered over the island for a long time and I will never forget the awesome sight of the devastation of over 95 percent of the buildings on seeing it the "morning after". That included the twisted mass of steel which was once St. Ann's Parish Center located where I live and the millions of dollars of damage done to the campus of St. Joseph High School where I teach.

But I also remember the first words that many of us said to each other after this disaster. "Thank God for life" was both our greeting and our prayer. We may have lost many of our material things but we still had the gift of life from our Creator.

The first week after Hugo was as bad as the night of that hurricane. Almost all of the communications on St. Croix were nonexistent and it was very difficult for us to contact the outside world or each other. I recall desperately listening to the "Voice of America" on the shortwave radio for some news about St. Croix and finding out that there was little or none. Then I found out that much of the press in the States was giving the wrong news by sensationalizing the looting, which could have happened anywhere, and not the awesome devastation and human suffering.

However, many of our friends soon found out and during the second month after Hugo much help started to come in from all of these good people. We are very thankful for that help and we are thankful that we still have life. We of St. Croix still need your material help—at St. Ann's, St. Joseph High School, and all over this largest U.S. Virgin Islands. But we also need your prayers to sustain us during the many delays and turned-down insurance claims and other requests for help. In return you can be assured that you will be remembered in all of our prayers from this island of the "Holy Cross".

In addition to the other help, I am in need of any kind of flower and vegetable seeds and small garden tools for my "Seeds for a New Life" program for my science students. My mailing address is: St. Joseph High School, #3 Mt. Pleasant, Route 2, Frederiksted, St. Croix, U.S. Virgin Islands, 00840.

[From the St. Croix Avis, Nov. 5-6, 1989]

IN THE EYE OF HUGO

(By Brother James A. Petrait, O.S.F.S.)

During one of my science classes at St. Joseph High School on St. Croix on Friday, September 15, 1989, we said a prayer that the coming hurricane named Hugo would pass us by as most do. At least, we hoped that it would only come close enough to give us some more rain water for our cisterns and perhaps to give us a day off from school because of excessive rain.

By Saturday morning, the reports on radio and TV started becoming more serious. They said that it was a good chance that a Level 4 hurricane would hit St. Croix by Sunday evening. Looking at my hurricane map. I noted that a Level 4 hurricane would result in roofs coming from houses and lighter structures blowing away.

All day Saturday at St. Ann's Parish on Barrenspot Hill, where I live, everyone helped in putting up plywood to cover the picture windows on the rectory and taping all of the other windows. Few seemed to be convinced that this would be a hurricane that would cause much damage but that it was good to be ready for it. On Saturday afternoon, a hurricane warning was issued and the weather was already becoming stormier.

In the basement of St. Ann's rectory is a cable TV control station for the Catholic Cable Network on St. Croix. As one of the operators of the station, I played some announcements with a special prayer for protection of life from the coming hurricane. In the audio portion. I continuously played a tape of a group saying the mysteries of the rosary. I know that the prayers of all who joined in somehow did help to protect most of the human life on St. Croix.

On Sunday morning, the weather was still not too bad. The 9 am and 11:30 am Masses at St. Ann's were held as usual. St. Ann's is noted for being one of the largest and most charismatic Catholic parishes in the Caribbean area. The 9 a.m. Mass was held in the large Parish Center building. This open-sided structure made of steel beams could hold 1200 people. Many of the seats were filled and the congregation praised and worshipped the Lord in their usual dynamic way.

On Sunday afternoon, the winds started blowing much stronger. The first floor TV studio and guest room at St. Ann's rectory has a concrete ceiling and is below the main stairs. I know that this would be the safest place to stay during the storm. Around 4 p.m. in the afternoon, the pastor, Fr. Elliott Thomas, became convinced also.

By Sunday evening, the winds were blowing fast enough that it would have been dangerous to go outside the building anymore. After 7 p.m., the winds really started blowing and beginnings of around a foot of rain began to come down. Fr. Elliott and I waited, listened to the radio, and prayed several rosaries together. The radio gave a report that we should not worry because the eye of the hurricane would probably miss St. Croix.

Then we heard loud noises, things were falling all over on top of the concrete ceiling and all around us. There were sounds of heavy objects falling and the sounds of twisting and bouncing pieces of metal. Looking out the window, I could see nothing but an eerie glow with all of the debris from the building and trees looking like a snowstorm in a place that has never seen snow.

More rosaries were said and all of the local radio stations stopped operating. One of the stations on St. Thomas was still operating and was giving a continuous stream of messages for help. At one point the Governor of the Virgin Islands had to use this broadcast station to give instructions to the police chief of St. Croix. No one seemed to know what was really happening on our island. We knew by our experience however that this was a very destructive storm.

The winds continued to howl with a pitch that I never heard before and the loud noises continued into the small hours of Monday morning. Water started dripping through the concrete ceiling and for awhile, I thought some of the concrete walls would be blown over.

Then around 2 a.m., everything stopped and it was completely still and quiet. We were in the eye of the hurricane! They said previously that the average winds in the eye would be 140 mph! Around that time my ears felt the same way as they do in going up in an airplane or high location. They felt like popping! The air pressure had become extremely low.

After 3 a.m., the winds started to subside a little and we felt that the hurricane had finally passed us by. We were then able to fall asleep resting in the arms of our God as never before.

Around 6 a.m., we were awakened by the breaking of daylight. Even though the winds were still strong and the rain was still falling, we could not resist to take a look at the outside world. And what a look that was! This was our "day after"! All around there was incredible damage.

The St. Ann's Parish Center was no longer a Parish Center. It was now a mass of twisted steel and a monument to the force of destruction. The roof on 2 of the rooms of the rectory were completely blown off and most of the galvanized covering on the other parts of the house were far away.

One of the rooms with a missing roof was that of Fr. Elliott. Thank God that he did not stay up there! A piece of porch railing broke off and hit a covered picture window in the dining room and blew it out and hurled a huge dining room table across the room. A large and heavy cabinet of dishes moved down the room and turned the corner into Fr. Elliott's room! Dishes and other debris were all over in 2 or 3 inches of water.

The roof and galvanized sheets on the roof of my room had been spared but one window and curtains were completely blown away and a heavy air conditioner flew 20 feet from the wall in which it was mounted. Some of my belongings were water damaged but I was fortunate compared to the damage suffered by others.

Bishop Sean O'Malley of the Virgin Islands had been staying at St. Joseph's Rectory, 4 miles away from St. Ann's during the storm. Fr. Elliott and I attempted to go see him but we were not able to make it very far down the usual road because of all of the fallen trees. The destruction we saw all over was mind-boggling. Almost every house was damaged and many other buildings looked similar to the Parish Center at St. Ann's. And on top of that a heavy smell of rotting vegetation filled the air.

Later I was able to arrive at the campus of St. Joseph High School and I saw the tremendous damage done to the school. Many of the roofs of the individual classroom buildings were off and a large part of the gym building was damaged. My own science classroom had its roof completely lifted off and much of the contents inside were scrambled and laying in 3 inches of green water on the floor. If that wasn't bad enough, the mosquitoes had also become plentiful from the stagnant water.

During the time after the storm, a few of the people on St. Croix took part in what was now known here as the "second hurricane." With stores that were severely damaged and with few police or national guard, the looting took place. In a short while practically, the whole economic system on St. Croix had collapsed. Beautiful stores were now empty shells with debris decaying in putrid water.

What was the reason for this "second hurricane?" Was it due to abnormal psychology or was it due to immorality? I won't answer that question here. But I will say that the news of that happening was distorted far out of proportion in the U.S. press. The people on St. Croix are good people and what happened here could happen anywhere in the States.

Soon after the hurricane, Bishop Sean O'Malley had a meeting with the priests and Religious on St. Croix. With his inspiring words and practical advice, we all began the important tasks of starting to rebuild our churches, schools, rectories, and convents. At St. Ann's Church, the parishioners were able to have the 9 a.m. Mass outside and all were filled with thankfulness for the sparing of most human life on St. Croix. On the following Sundays, the parish was able to use the old chapel with the help of an additionally scheduled Mass. However, the parishioners look forward to the day when they will have a new, strong, and large church.

At the St. Joseph High School campus, we were able to come up with 4 useable classrooms at the school and at St. Joseph Church. In addition, the pastor of St. Patrick's Church in Frederiksted donated the use of 4 unused classrooms at that location. On October 2 and 3, we had a meeting with the students and their parents at St. Joseph Church and all were filled in about the details of the school's reopening.

In addition, the students were given written and service assignments to do that were related to Hugo. My own project was called "Molecule For Life" and through it some students were able to help the St. Croix Catholic parishes to restore some additional quality of life. One student even helped out at the newly constructed tent-hospital.

Because the public schools on the Island are taking a long time to open and because they recognized the quality of education at our school, over 50 students took entrance tests to enter St. Joseph High School. St. Joseph High School is recognized as being one of the top schools in the Caribbean area. It is the only school in the entire United States that has had 3 Presidential scholars in the last 4 years!

On October 9, St. Joseph High School reopened at two campuses with an increasing number of students. All of the dedicated faculty of the school have returned and by praying and working together, we are making it work. In my own science classes, I hope to implement a program in the coming weeks to have students planting and caring for flower and vegetable seeds. I call it "Seeds for New Life." The success of that program will depend on the amount of seeds and small gardening tools that some may want to donate.

We are recovering on St. Croix and we hope that by this time next year life will be back to normal. But we still need your help and your prayers. Be assured that you and the many problems that you have are also in our prayers.

THE CASE FOR JOHN DEMJANJUK, SR.

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, John Demjanjuk, Sr. is currently on death row awaiting appeal by the Israeli Supreme Court. Mr. Demjanjuk was convicted as being the infamous "Ivan the Terrible" of the Treblinka death camp. He was convicted on the basis of the investigation conducted by the Office of Special Investigation [OSI].

As long ago as last year, it was brought to my attention that investigative reports of OSI officers Garand and Dougherty (Exhibits A and B) were discarded in a McDonald's dumpster near K Street in Washington, DC. This represented critical evidence that former Nazi guard Otto Horn perjured his testimony during the denaturalization trial of Mr. Demjanjuk. (Exhibit C.)

In addition, CBS's "60 Minutes" conducted an investigation that revealed new information that now includes the statements of Maria Dudek. Dudek, a lifetime resident of a village near the Treblinka death camp, has stated off-camera that she knew Ivan "Grozny" or Ivan the Terrible in Polish. Dudek stated that Ivan "Grozny" would come to the village and buy sexual favors and vodka with gold that he had taken from Jewish prisoners. From that point she then identified, off camera, Ivan "Grozny" as Ivan Marczenko, not Ivan Demjanjuk. (Exhibit D.)

More alarming is the fact that the OSI has known since 1979 that John Demjanjuk's name was not listed in any World War II record associating him with the Treblinka death camp whatsoever. (Exhibit E.) Evidently, the Polish War Crimes Commission notified the Office of Special Investigation that they had no information linking Demjanjuk at Treblinka indicating to the OSI that there were 100 Ukranian guards at Treblinka, of which, 43 were known. Of those 43 names, Ivan Marczenko is listed. Demjanjuk is not. (Exhibit F.)

Here I would like to site the case of Frank Walus who was charged with having committed Nazi war crimes, was dropped because the Polish war crimes records did not indicate that he had been at a camp in Kielce. (Exhibit G.) Again, it is evident that the OSI was relying on fraudulent evidence. What is interesting is that the former director of the OSI, Allan Ryan, clearly recognized the misinformation involved in the Walus case but this same type of scrutiny did not lend itself to the Demjanjuk case. Frank Walus was an innocent man that had no business even being in court. Just as John Demjanjuk has no business rotting in a prison.

The OSI mandate of investigating Nazi war crimes is praiseworthy. However, the OSI should not blatantly ignore the rules and procedures developed by our forefathers to facilitate justice nor should they allow themselves to be so overcome with zeal that they operated in violation of individual rights. Justice will not be served until John Demjanjuk, Sr. is brought home.

To: Arthur Sinai, Deputy Director, OSI.
From: George W. Garand, Historian.
Subject: HORN, Otto—Report of Interview.
Ref: OSI #42—DEMJANJUK, Ivan.

On the morning of 14 November 1979 Norman Moscowitz, Staff Attorney, OSI, Bernard J. Dougherty, Jr., Criminal Investigator, and George W. Garand, Historian, OSI interviewed the German national Otto Horn at his residence located at 66 Yorkstrasse, West Berlin. The interview began shortly after 0900 and ended shortly before 1000. Mr. Dougherty and the undersigned translated during the interview which was conducted in German since Horn is conversant only in that language.

Horn is 76 years old and lives in a small one-bedroom apartment by himself. His place of residence was meticulously clean and despite his advanced years he conveys the impression of being stable with an excellent recall of events during the time he was stationed at Treblinka. Shown a sketch of the death camp at the beginning of the interview he identified various buildings within the camp without hesitation. He was assigned to the camp for approximately one year, from September 1943 to September 1943, and specifically to the upper part of the camp which housed the gas chambers. The old, smaller one remained in use until a larger new one went into operation in early 1943, at which time the old one was torn down. In connection with the layout and operation of the camp Horn mentioned that the installation was surrounded by guard towers manned by about 25 Ukranian guards at varying shifts. In addition, these Ukranians who were armed with rifles and wore some type of uniform the color of which the interviewee no longer remembered would await the arrival of trains at the unloading platform at which time the new arrivals were herded along a narrow walk to a shed where they were forced to take off their clothing. Thereupon, again following a narrow footpath which was fenced on both sides to block the view of the new arrivals from what was ahead, the victims were rushed to the gas chamber on the upper level. When the chamber was full the doors were slammed shut and a German named Schmidt or Schmitt would supervise the actual gassing. Two Ukranians worked directly under Schmidt. One of these operated the machinery that funneled the lethal gas into the chamber while the other supervised the inmate work detail that removed the bodies from the chamber and dumped them into two very large pits that had been dug nearby. While the Ukrainians at the train unloading platform rotated between there and the guard towers the two Ukrainians assigned to the gas chamber itself were invariably present at each gassing. He no longer recalled the name of the Ukrainian responsible for overseeing the removal of the bodies, but had a good recall of the one responsible for operating the death machinery. That man's first name was Iwan, a tall heavy set individual approximately in his mid-twenties at the time with shortly cropped hair and full facial features. He never knew Iwan's family name since such names were in any case very difficult to pronounce and the Ukrainians were invariably addressed only by their first names. Iwan took great pride in his position as assistant to Schmidt and felt that this status placed him a few rungs above the other Ukrainians who acted merely as guards. Iwan would appear on the scene only after a trainload of victims had arrived and would leave the premises as soon as he had accomplished his assigned task, leaving the removal of bodies to the second Ukrainian and his crew. Horn commented that he never did trust the Ukrainians who spent most of their time carousing in the nearby Polish villages from where they would return drunk late at night, shouting and carrying on and firing their weapons. In contrast to the other Ukrainians who were without exception armed with rifles, Iwan was armed with a pistol of unknown make. He was never observed as making use of this weapon.

Horn's opinion of the Ukrainians was generally unfavorable. Not only did they fall asleep at their assigned guard posts, but they also tended to show disrespect towards the lower ranking Germans assigned to the camp. At the same time he questioned their political reliability, since later in the war, during 1943, a number of them deserted to the Russian partisans. In one instance, when the Treblinka camp was closed down in late 1943 and the Ukrainians were being transferred to Sobibor, escorted by a German officer, the Ukrainians murdered their escort and joined the partisans.

Initially shown a series of eight photographs of Caucasion males, Horn carefully viewed each photograph that depicted an individual wearing dark clothing. Each one of the photographs showed a frontal view of the individual down to a few inches below the neck. Hair styles of these individuals varies, as did length of hair, physical stature and age that varied from the low twenties into the forties. One of the photographs depicted Iwan Demjanjuk as he appeared in the early 1940s. After studying each of the photographs at length Horn initially could not make positive identification of any of the individuals though on one or two occasions he felt that one or two of the individuals shown looked vaguely familiar to him, though he could not recall where and under what circumstances he had met them. At this point the first group of photographs was gathered up and placed on one end of the table with the one depicting Demjanjuk left facing upward on top of the pile. Mr. Dougherty thereupon presented a second series of eight photographs to the interviewee, each showing a second group of male Caucasians clothed in what would normally be considered closer to civilian attire than the clothing worn by most members of the first group. One of the photographs in the second group was that of Iwan Demjanjuk, taken in the early 1950s and depicted Demjanjuk with a fuller and more rounded face and a more receding hairline. Horn studied this photograph intensively and then, looking at the earlier photograph of Demjanjuk, identified that individual on both. Nevertheless, he noted some minor differences, such as Iwan having had somewhat more hair at the time he knew him.

Towards the conclusion of the interview Horn expressed his willingness to be reinterviewed more formally provided there was no publicity. Throughout the interview Horn displayed an alert mind and with regard to the events at Treblinka during the period he was assigned there, his recall is excellent. All questions put to him were answered in a forthright manner and in the mind of the undersigned there is no doubt as to the man's honesty and integrity. It would appear that this man, at age 76, has had ample time to take stock of his life, and in the opinion of the undersigned, helping our investigation is one way in which in the twilight of his life this man is trying to make amends for the things that happened at Treblinka and elsewhere during World War II.

Ref: OSI #42—Demjanjuk, Iwan.

On November 14, 1979, Otto Horn, German national and citizen of West Berlin, was interviewed at this residence, Yorck-Strasse 66, Berlin, Germany, by Norman Moscowitz, Staff Attorney-OSI, and by the reporting officer. Due to the fact that Horn neither spoke nor understood English, the entire interview was conducted in his native German language, with George Garand-OSI and the reporting officer translating. The interview began at 9:04 a.m.

After initial greetings and introductory comments, Horn was shown a site plan of the death camp at Treblinka, Poland. Various buildings within the death camp area were pointed out to Horn and he was able to properly identify each of them. Of specific importance was the exact location of the new gas chamber, which Horn described. During the course of the questioning concerning the operation of the gas chamber, Horn voluntarily mentioned one "Iwan" (last name unknown), who was one of two Ukrainians who were responsible for the actual operation of the engines which provided the gas for the chambers. Horn was unable to recall the name of the other Ukrainian, describing him as tall and thin, with blond hair, and being approximately 22-23 years of age. Horn further recalled that the two Ukrainians were immediately subordinate to a German, known only as "Schmidt."

Horn described "Iwan" as being of stocky build, black hair—cut short, full rounded face, tall, with no distinguishing marks on his face. Horn remarked that "Iwan" had some technical ability, since he repaired and maintained the gas engine and was known by Horn as being able to drive an automobile (apparantly somewhat of a rarity among the Ukrainians at that time). Horn indicated that he arrived at Treblinka during September, 1942 and stated that "Iwan" was already working there. Horn added that "Iwan", Schmidt, and the other unidentified Ukrainian were the only three individuals who actually worked at the gas chamber, that is, in the operation of the engine. Horn stated that for the period September 1942-September 1943, when he was at Treblinka, "Iwan" worked at the gas chamber every day. Horn pointed out that "Iwan" looked upon the other Ukrainians in the camp, which he roughly estimated at 30-40, with disdain, because he was working with Schmidt. During the evenings, "Iwan" and some of the others would travel into nearby Polish towns and become drunk and boisterious.

Horn stated that he never witnessed "Iwan" beating, shooting, or otherwise abusing any of the prisoners. His sole task was to work at the gas chamber.

At this point, the reporting officers advised Horn that there were a series of 8 photographs of caucasian males, which he was requested to review carefully and individually. Each of the photographs depicted an individual in dark clothing. Prior to the interveiw, care was taken to minimize the amount of uniforms which would be readily discernable in each photograph. Nevertheless on a few photos, a portion of a uniform could be seen. Each picture showed the bust of the subject. The individuals possessed hair of different length, varying physical builds, and a variety of ages, ranging from the early twenties to the forties. One of the photographs was that of Iwan Demjanjuk, taken during the early 1940s. Horn studied each of the photographs at length but was unable to positively identify any of the pictures, although he believed that he recognized one of them (not Demjanjuk) but was not able to indicate where he had met this person or provide his name.

The first series of photographs was then gathered and placed in a stack, off to the side of the table—with that of Demjanjuk lying face up on the top of the pile, facing Horn. The reporting officer then presented another series of 8 photographs, each depicting the bust of a male caucasian. These photographs showed the individuals in clothing more similar to that normally worn by civilians. Among the 8 pictures was one of Iwan Demjanjuk, which had been taken during the early 1950's. This photograph was much better in quality than that presented to HORN in the first series, and depicted Demjanjuk as having a much fuller and more rounded face. Horn studied this photograph at length, and upon glancing at the earlier picture of Demjanjuk, identified them as being the same person. As he continued to study the picture from the second set, Horn indicated that it certainly resembled the man that he had known as "Iwan", although he stated that "Iwan" had had somewhat more hair. He further mentioned that the second picture, depicting the fuller face, was much more like that of "Iwan" than the person shown in the first series. After a few more moments of careful study, Horn positively identified the photographs of Iwan Demjanjuk as being the "Iwan" that he knew at the gas chamber in Treblinka.

After the identification was completed, Horn was asked if he would be willing to be re-interviewed on a formal basis in the near future, and he agreed, with the stipulation that it be "confidential", that is, there was to be no press or other publicity. Mr. Moscowitz agreed to this condition, and the interview was terminated at 0955 a.m.

It was the impression of Moscowitz, Garand, and the reporting officer that Horn was honest, sincere and forthright in all of his responses, and was fully cooperative throughout the interview. Due to his age (76) and request for absolutely no publicity, it is not believed that he would agree to travel to the United States to testify nor would he be favorable to video-taping an interview (as he would probably believe that it was actually a TV news camera). Prior to the formal re-interview, with defense counsel present (who would undoubtedly cross-examine and quite possibly upset Horn) it is highly advisable that he be informally briefed on what to expect, immediately prior to this interview. Furthermore, in view of his advanced age, it is requested that any follow-up business which may involve Horn be conducted on a priority basis. Finally, in the event that Horn must be telephonically contacted, his number is (030)7852465.

Following are excerpts from sworn testimony of Otto Horn:

INFORMATION FROM "60 MINUTES" PROGRAM OF FEBRUARY 25TH, RE: JOHN DEMJANJUK

Narration: Back in Cleveland, John Demjanjuk, Jr. and his mother continued to hope that they might find new witnesses that would clear Demjanjuk. These witnesses, they believe, are in Poland—but his defense lawyers have been denied entry visas.

John Demjanjuk, Jr.: All we want to do is get into Poland, find the witnesses, people that are still living near Treblinka that were there at the time, yet we are unable to do so.

Narration: We went to this small village about a mile from Treblinka that has changed little over the last forty years.

Ed Bradley: It was here that the Ukrainian guards came to get away from the camp. They bought vodka at a house over here from the Dudek family. The man known even to villagers here as Ivan Grozny—Ivan the Terrible—was a regular customer. He brought gold with him, gold he had taken from Jews at Treblinka, to pay for his vodka, and for the privilege of sleeping with Dudek's wife.

Narration: Dudek's wife, Maria, still lives in the same house. She was afraid to talk to the camera, but told us she remembers those evenings with Ivan the Terrible, and she remembers his real name—Ivan Marzcenko.

Narration: We found Ivan Marzcenko's name in the Polish War Crimes Commission in Warsaw, on a list of Ukrainian guards who were at Treblinka. And Ivan Demjanjuk? His name was not there.

John Demjanjuk, Sr.: "I'm innocent, innocent, innocent. And God is my witness."

Narration: But the fundamental weakness of Demjanjuk's attempts to establish that innocence was his alibi . . . That POW camp where he claimed to have been all this time, was a transit camp where no prisoner stayed for longer than a few weeks.

FRANK WALUS

Between the time the appeal was argued and the decision was handed down, however, the Office of Special Investigations had been established within the Justice Department. Its purpose was to handle the prosecution of all alleged war criminals in the country. The Walus case was consequently turned over to Special Investigations and its director, Allan Ryan.

"When the decision [on the appeal] came down," Ryan says, "I recall I had one very strong reaction: If this guy was guilty, we did not have a very persuasive case, and if he was not guilty, we did not have any business being in court at all."

He ordered a complete review of the evidence. All witnesses were re-interviewed. The authenticity of the documents and photographs introduced as evidence by Walus' lawyers was verified. Hundreds of people who should have known Walus if he had been in Kielce and Crestochowa were contacted. "To make a long story short, we tried to find out everything we could about what Frank Walus had done during the war and afterward," he says.

Ryan consulted the archives of a Polish government commission that had prosecuted war criminals. Its work was considered thorough and impartial, its records voluminous. What he found surprised him. There were no allegations against Walus or against anybody for whom Walus could have been mistaken, Ryan says. "That, by itself, is significant," he says. "It's like the old cliché or the watchdog that didn't bark. If a person had been involved in the SS or the Gestapo, there certainly would have been some mention of him."

On November 26, 1980, Ryan and then-U.S. Attorney Thomas Sullivan announced they were dropping all charges.

Even so, prosecutors still maintain they were correct in filing the charges in the first place. "I thought we had a solid basis to proceed with the case," says Carlson.

Says Gubbins: "If you had seven people come in and say he killed my father or he killed my friend, you're going to go with the case.

"As it wound up," Gubbins adds, "the trial was based on eyewitness testimony. But the memories were 35 years old. If anything, the Walus case showed that eyewitness testimony that old and related to that kind of conduct is not something that works well in our system of justice."

"I think the [prosecution witnesses] were honest people," Ryan says. "I have no reason to think they were perjuring themselves, perjury meaning, of course, intentionally lying. I think they probably did have somebody in mind. But Mr. Walus was not the person."

KANSAS UNIVERSITY STUDY SUPPORTS AGENCY BASED VOTER REGISTRATION

HON. JIM SLATTERY

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, recently the House of Representatives overwhelmingly approved H.R. 2190, the National Voter Registration Act. This measure will remove many existing barriers to voter registration and will make it possible for Federal and State Governments to actively encourage eligible citizens to register to vote. One way in which H.R. 2190 would encourage voter registration is by mandating that State and Federal offices and private sector locations which provide public services be required to distribute and collect applications for voter registration and forward the applications to the appropriate election officials.

Recently, researchers at the University of Kansas published in the American Journal of Community Psychology the results of a study they conducted of the effects of increasing the accessibility of registration at two community food distribution sites in Lawrence, KS. The article, authored by Stephen B. Fawcett, Tom Seekins, and Louise Silber, reveals an increase of up to 100 percent in the percentage of eligible persons registered to vote, with 51 percent of those registering after the onsite registration drive voting in the subsequent Presidential election. I commend this study to my colleagues and I am pleased that the House of Representatives has overwhelmingly supported agency-based voter registration efforts.

The article follows:

LOW-INCOME VOTER REGISTRATION: A SMALL-SCALE EVALUATION OF AN AGENCY-BASED REGISTRATION STRATEGY [1]

(By Stephen B. Fawcett,[2] Tom Seekins, and Louise Silber)

Voter registration by poor people is a prominent strategy for empowerment. On-site registration in accessible settings such as community centers and welfare offices is a promising tactic. This study provided a small-scale evaluation of this strategy by experimentally examining the effects of increasing the accessibility of registration, and providing prompts to register, in two commodity food distribution sites. Results showed up to a 100% increase in the percentage of people registered to vote, with 51% of those registering after the on-site registration drive voting in the subsequent presidential election. We discuss these findings and the potential contributions of such small-scale evaluations of social change strategies to community empowerment.

Historically, unnecessary monetary and behavioral requirements have been a primary means of restricting voting by people of low-income and minority status. In the past, these included poll taxes and literacy tests. Currently, they include denying voting rights to the homeless based on the absence of "fixed" street addresses, occasionally prohibiting registration in places that are frequented by the poor, and maintaining inconvenient times and places for voters registration. As a consequence, fewer lower income people vote; resulting in less political support for adequate nutrition, health care, housing, and other benefits for this group.

Agency-based voter registration is designed to remove some obstacles to registering to vote (Human Serve Fund, 1984; Piven & Cloward, 1988). This strategy facilities registration by bringing voter registrars, deputized by the county clerk or election board, to places frequented by people of low income such as community service centers, welfare offices, and unemployment offices. Despite the widespread use of this strategy, it has not been evaluated empirically.

This study examined the effects of providing on-site opportunities to register—reducing the behavioral requirements for registering—and verbal encouragements to register—a form of prompting—on voter registration and subsequent voting. We received permission from the directors of two community service centers to register poverty clients while they waited in line for government commodities on specified distribution days. We were also deputized by the county clerk to register voters during these times. Consequently, this situation permitted a small-scale evaluation of a widely used, agency-based strategy for voter registration.

D.C. METHOD

Participants and Settings

Five hundred and fifty-two enrollees in commodity distribution programs of two community service centers were targeted for voter registration. Both centers were located in Lawrence, Kansas, a city of 57,000 people. The program distributed cheese, butter, honey, flour, corn meal, and other commodities purchased and stored by the federal government as part of agriculture price-support policies. People with annual incomes less than 125% of the federal poverty level were eligible for the commodities distribution program. The amount of commodities received was determined by family size. To receive commodities, a person had to register with one distribution agency.

Penn House, the first service center, is located in a low-income neighborhood close to the city's business district. Its clients consist primarily of single mothers with young children. Penn House distributed commodities to approximately 379 different recipients during the intervention portion of the study. Ballard Center, the second distribution site, is located in a semi-rural, largely white, low-income neighborhood on the edge of the city and is separated from the city by a river. Its clients include a number of elderly people on fixed incomes. Ballard Center distributed commodities to approximately 173 registered recipients.

We secured the agreement of the county clerk to establish voter registration outposts at the two service centers and registered clients during times of commodity distribution. The authors, and one collaborator from each agency, were trained in registration procedures and officially deputized by the county clerk.

At Penn House, a deputized registrar approached each person as he/she waited in a line inside the building. The registrar stated that Penn House was sponsoring a voter registration drive and asked if the person was registered to vote. If the person answered "Yes," the registrar made a brief statement like, "Great!" or "Don't forget to vote!" and moved on to the next person in line.

If the person said he or she was not registered, the registrar asked "May I help you register?" For persons refusing, the registrar said "I hope you do so" or "Let us know if you change your mind," and noted that they could sign up at Penn House or the county clerk's office before a specific cutoff date and still vote in the next election.

If the person was willing to register, the registrar said something like "Terrific!", recorded the simple identification information required on the registration form, assigned the new voter a precinct and ward, and issued a voter's card. The registrar then moved on to the next person in line.

There were some minor differences in procedure at the second site to accommodate variations in how food was distributed and to enhance the modest effects of the procedure. At Ballard Center, recipients were seated, as a group, in a large classroom. Each was called forward individually to receive the commodity allotment. As they left the classroom, recipients were approached by registrars who followed the procedures described above. During the last registration period at Ballard Center, numerical information about the total number of Ballard recipients eligible to register and the number of recipients who were registered was posted on large signs outside the classroom. In addition to following the procedures described above, the registrar pointed out the signs to individuals indicating they were not registered and summarized the numerical information verbally.

Recording

The county clerk maintains a list of all registered voters who voted in any election within a four-year period. With permission of the directors of the centers, we checked each name and address on the alphabetized commodities lists against the alphabetized voter registration. When a name and address match was found, observers recorded the earliest date of registration. The county voting register was reviewed to identify registered commodity recipients who had voted in the presidential election held November 6, 1984. We recorded whether each registered commodity recipient had voted or not voted. In addition, we recorded the party affiliation (Democrat, Republican, or independent) of each registered recipient who voted.

To assess reliability, we independently scored the registration status of 15 randomly selected commodity recipients and the voting records for an equal number of participants. These checks repeatedly produced complete agreement.

Experimental Design

A multiple baseline design across groups, sometimes referred to as an "interrupted time series design with switching replications" (Cook & Campbell, 1979), was used to evaluate the effects of the voter registration drive. On-site registration and prompting was scheduled to coincide with commodity distribution days at each of the community service centers. The intervention was staggered across the two centers.

RESULTS

Figure 1 presents the results of the voter registration intervention. During the 13 weeks of baseline at Penn House, 85 (22%) of the 379 clients participating in the Commodities distribution program were registered voters. Following the three on-site registrations during commodity distribution days, 168 (44%) of the clients were registered and eligible to vote in the next election. [Figure 1 not reproducible in the RECORD.]

During the 15 weeks of baseline for Ballard Center, 121 (70%) of the 173 clients participating in the commodities distribution program were registered voters. Following four on-site registrations during commodity distribution days, 159 (92%) of the clients were registered to vote. A chi-square was computed on the increase in voter registration, using the number previously registered to vote and the total number registered to vote ($X^2 = 5.18$, $df = 1$, $p < .05$). Table I summarizes these results for clients in both agencies.

Table II presents the voting pattern of registered commodity recipients. A grand total of 327 commodity recipients from both centers were registered and eligible to vote in the general election of November 6, 1984, and 215 of them (66%) voted. Of those who voted, 100 (47%) declared a Democratic party affiliation, 40 (19%) declared as Republicans, and 75 (35%) declared as independent voters.

Of the 206 commodity recipients registered to vote before intervention, 153 (74%) voted. Of those, 81 (53%) were declared Democrats, 35 (23%) were declared Republicans, and 37 (24%) were declared independent voters.

Of the 121 commodity recipients registered after intervention, 62 (51%) voted. Of those, 19 (31%) declared as Democrats, 5 (8%) as Republicans, and 38 (61%) as independent voters.

A chi-square was computed on the difference in voting for old and new registrants, using the number not voting and the number voting for both groups ($X^2 = 17.96$, $df = 1$, $p < .01$).

DISCUSSION

This study demonstrated the effectiveness of a simple and workable procedure—reduced response requirements and verbal prompts—on voter registration by clients of two poverty service agencies. Visual inspection of interrupted time series data showed the increases to occur only after agency-based registration, making less plausible the hypothesis that other correlated events may have caused the observed effect. Similarly, statistical analysis suggested that the effects were due to other than chance. Although over one half of the new registrants subsequently voted, those registered before the agency-based registration were significantly more likely to vote.

Despite the absence of any programmed prompts or consequences for voting, the results showed some generalization from registering to actual voting. This might be explained by the common practice of political parties in general, and the Democratic party in particular, of targeting new registrants for telephone prompts before and during election day. Although the necessity of registration drives is suggested by this study, their sufficiency in producing voting by substantial numbers of low-income people is an important focus for future research. This question is particularly important in light of the relatively low rates of voting observed for new registrants. Similarly, experimental evidence regarding the function of massive voter turnout by people of low income on regulatory and distributive policies and related benefits for this group is nonexistent.

Several features of this study may limit the generality of these findings. Since the registration sessions were conducted only at peak times for several cheese distributions, some of those considered as cheese clients did not receive even one personal verbal invitation to register while others received as many as four invitations. Second, because personal contacts may not have occurred for some participants and because more than one family member was occasionally present to pick up commodities, the number of participants was only an estimate of the actual number of people contacted by the intervention. Third, since one group consisted primarily of single mothers with young children and the other primarily of elderly people on fixed incomes, there is a need for caution in generalizing these effects to other groups and settings. Finally, because the authors were the voter registrars in this study, it is not known whether this procedure would be implemented by service providers in these settings, although its reported use by the other human service agencies suggests its potential for widespread implementation.

Incumbent politicians and front-runners may be particularly unlikely to support agency-based voter registration since it may encourage participation by unpredictable voters (Human Serve Fund, 1984; Piven & Cloward, 1988), and may fail to preserve a social structure that diminishes the extent and force of organized efforts by poor people (Piven & Cloward, 1979, p. 3). Yet voting in large numbers may be essential to the empowerment of people who share the common experience of being poor (Fawcett, Seekins, Whang, Muiu, & Suarez de Balcazar, 1984; Rappaport, 1981). By delivering their votes contingent on support for resource allocations (Seekins & Fawcett, 1987) and other desired outcomes, organized groups of low-income voters can create a more reciprocal relationship with elected officials whose votes on legislation affect the group's welfare (Seekins & Fawcett, 1986; Seekins, Maynard-Moody, & Fawcett, 1987). Such empowerment through voting may have the additional social benefit of avoiding the disruption and conflict that can be expected under conditions of sustained or growing inequality.

Small-scale experiments (Fairweather & Tornatsky, 1977) such as this one can contribute to the efficacy of broader strategies for social change. Because such experiments are relatively inexpensive in time and research costs, ineffective methods can be abandoned or modified without significant harm. By evaluating exemplars of more broadly used strategies, such as agency-based voter registration, researchers can contribute to knowledge of general use to social advocates. In so doing, scientists and advocates can collaborate with disadvantaged groups in the quest for a more equitable distribution of resources.

A TRIBUTE TO VLADLEN KONSTANTINOVICH PAVLENKOV

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to have placed in the RECORD a farewell statement by the son of Vladlen Pavlenkov. Mr. Pavlenkov, general manager and founder of Freedom of Communications, will be sorely missed by the dissidents and ethnic minorities of the U.S.S.R. He led the worldwide struggle to end of the Soviet Union's deliberate interruption of the international mail. This tribute from his son says many things about a dedicated father and a brave brother who was murdered by the KGB in reprisal for Vladlen's work here in the Congress.

Mr. Pavlenkov was our expert witness for many years at our Postal Committees hearings on the issue of Soviet Mail Interruption. His creativity, drive, sense of humor, and extraordinary compassion for individuals who lived behind the Iron Curtain was a great source of inspiration for me and many of my colleagues.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I request that the full text of the statement be printed at this point in the RECORD:

A TRIBUTE TO VLADLEN KONSTANTINOVICH PAVLENKOV

Vladlen Konstantinovich Pavlenkov was born on May 4, 1929 in the city of Nizhnii Novgorod (Gorky). His parents were teachers: his mother taught Political Science in college; his father, colonel in the army during World War 2, was the head of the School System in Gorky. From a very young age, his work ethic and dedication were remarkable. In 1945 he was awarded a medal for his work effort during the WW2. In 1951 he graduated from Gorky University with a degree in history. During 1951-54 he worked as a history teacher in Germany. In 1957 he married Svetlana Borisovna Gerasimova who became his loyal friend and wife for all his life.

His teaching career, during which he was a school teacher, school principal and a lecturer in college was stopped on October 3, 1969 when he was arrested and later convicted of "antisoviet propaganda and agitation". The reason behind that was his writing of a book on economy "2×2=4", where he attempted to outline solutions to the economic problems of his country. He also felt a personal responsibility as a Russian to protest Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968. His popularity among the people soared after his arrest and KGB used all of their methods trying to break him and force him to ask for forgiveness. But interrogations, tortures and hunger did not break his will. For one request from his views he was offered a free life! But he won that battle and served 7 years in jail proudly and he never collaborated with KGB. His name in Russian has two meanings: Will Power and Freedom. He embodied those two qualities.

He never wanted to leave, even though he could work after his release from jail only as a street sweeper. But when he was blackmailed with a life of his only son, Victor, he decided to emigrate. When he came to the USA, he was 50 years old and he did not speak English. He worked in the USA as a security guard all this years.

In 1982 he founded a non-profit organization, Freedom of Communications Committee (FC). The goal of FC was to promote opportunities for personal contact such as mail, telephone and travel between people in the US and in the USSR. By fighting for real freedom of contact, FC was working to make Soviet society more open and to aid in the development of democratic ideas and tendencies within the Soviet Union. Through FC, he accomplished outstanding results. He collected and disseminated a lot of information about communications with people in USSR. He published a book "Advice to Mailers" in Russian and in English. He issued a periodical newsletter "Mail to the USSR". Five amendments presented by the U.S. delegation to the Universal Postal Union (UPU) Congress in 1984 were initiated by him. Four of the amendments presented by U.S. delegation to the UPU Congress in Washington, DC in November 1989 were initiated by him. Under his pressure, the United States Postal Service took action to protect its customers from Soviet postal violations and published a booklet of advice for senders of mail to the USSR.

He testified many times before hearings of the US Congress on Soviet disruption of international mail.

His organization also donated medical equipment and computers to Russia to help victims of communist repression.

Thousands of thankful letters from the citizens of USA and USSR were the best indication of his successes.

But KGB did not forgive him his success. In 1983 in Gorky his younger brother Igor was forced to take his own life. In the memory of his brother he changed his name to Vladlen Igor Konstantinovich Pavlenkov. Even during period of 'glastnost', KGB tried to refuse him a visit to his homeland. Only after extensive help from the US House of Representatives, he was allowed a three day visit to Gorky. There he was met as a hero. He would be remembered in US and in Russia as a hero who dedicated his life to the cause of Freedom and Justice. He became a US citizen in 1987 and he never forget his troubled motherland. He died on January 31, 1990. "Thank you, Father, for Your Life!"

[From farewell speech of his son.]

REMOVAL OF TAX BARRIERS TO UNITED STATES BUSINESSES COMPETING IN THE EUROPEAN COMMUNITY

HON. SAM GIBBONS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation along with our colleagues, Mr. FRENZEL, Mr. ARCHER, Mr. SCHULZE, Mr. PEASE, Mr. MATSUI, Mr. DORGAN, Mr. MCGRATH, Mr. LEVIN, and Mrs. JOHNSON, that would allow United States businesses a full and fair opportunity to take advantage of the expanding market opportunities in the European Community. This legislation would remove unnecessary barriers in the United States tax laws that prevent United States businesses from eliminating duplicative and costly operations in Europe. The European Community, soon to be the world's largest integrated market, provides great opportunity for United States companies and for the growth of United States and world trade. However, the creation of the unified European market could seriously injure the United States if United States companies are not permitted to compete with foreign enterprises in the European Community on equal terms or cannot participate fully in the benefits of the open market.

United States industries are working diligently to ensure that they will be competitive throughout Europe when the internal barriers to trade are eliminated, and the United States Government is working to ensure that new European barriers are not created. Despite these efforts, Congress must consider how our own laws will affect United States competitiveness in Europe and must eliminate or modify rules which unnnecessarily hamper United States industry.

This legislation would remove barriers under subpart F of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 that unnecessarily restrict the ability of United States-owned businesses to compete with European, Japanese and other international enterprises in the European Community.

Under present law, U.S. multinationals are generally subject to current U.S. corporate income tax on undistributed earnings of their controlled foreign corporations to the extent those earnings constitute subpart F income. Two types of subpart F income are "foreign base company sales income" and "foreign base company services income." These rules often subject U.S.-based multinationals to current U.S. taxation on their foreign subsidiaries' undistributed profits from sales to, or services performed for, entities in other countries. For example, under these rules, a United States corporation is taxed immediately—even without repatriation of earnings—on its United Kingdom subsidiary's income attributable to purchases of goods manufactured in the United States by the parent and sold to unrelated buyers in Germany, France or any country other than the United Kingdom.

These subpart F rules were enacted almost 30 years ago to deter U.S. corporations from avoiding taxes by establishing base companies that artificially shift income to tax haven countries. Unfortunately, the rules have not kept pace with the country's need to compete internationally, and in some cases no longer serve their intended purpose. For instance, the subpart F rules provide strong incentives for United States-based multinationals to create separate subsidiaries in every European Community country into which the United States parent markets its products. This produces inefficiencies and additional costs that foreign-owned competitors avoid by centralizing their European operations.

Without the bill I am introducing today, our subpart F rules could seriously dampen the prospects for the United States to share equally in the foreign trade benefits created by the new European Common Market. United States-based multinational corporations will be discouraged from capturing one of the primary competitive advantages created through the European integration—advantages available to Japanese and European owned companies. Foreign owned companies have already started to rationalize operations to promote economies of scale and other efficiencies, while many U.S.-owned multinationals are faced with the Hobson's choice between consolidating but subpart F taxation, or maintaining separate, less-efficient subsidiaries in every EC country in which they do business.

The bill I am introducing would eliminate the subpart F handicap and encourage United States industry to expand into the European Community to help alleviate the United States trade deficit and create economic growth in the United States. The bill would treat European Community countries as a single country for purposes of applying the subpart F rules. For example, under the bill, like its Japanese and European based competitors, a United Kingdom subsidiary of a United States corporation could sell goods to customers throughout Europe without the income from such sales being subject to the subpart F penalty tax rules.

It is essential that we act as quickly as possible to remove these barriers to United States businesses operating in Europe. Our principal competitors in the European market are already able to consolidate their business operations and efficiently develop the new European market.

It has been suggested that this bill may not be necessary because most European Community countries have tax rates that currently result in sales and services income being excludible from subpart F income under the so-called high-tax exception. This is not the case, even in the high-tax jurisdictions of most of the European Community, a foreign subsidiary's earnings can fluctuate out of the high-tax exception in any particular year because the exception is based on U.S. tax accounting rules rather than those of the foreign jurisdiction. Thus, mere timing differences in reporting income under United States and foreign tax accounting rules can create subpart F income even though such timing differences were not the abuse that subpart F was intended to address.

Finally, to preclude opportunities for manipulating the relief granted by the bill, its single country rule is limited to European countries with statutory tax rates approximately equal to or greater than the maximum U.S. corporate tax rate and that do not exempt corporations from taxation of this type of income pursuant to any tax holiday.

In conclusion, I believe that U.S. foreign trade problems must be fought on all fronts, including the modification of U.S. tax laws that unwisely penalize sound business decisions by U.S.-based multinationals competing for foreign trade. The efforts of the administration to prevent the erection of European barriers and the efforts of U.S. companies to ensure our competitiveness in Europe after 1992 should not be undermined by U.S. tax rules which were not intended to deal with, and indeed never considered, the implications of an integrated Europe.

Economists predict that the new European common market will be a major source of economic growth in the 1990's and beyond. Without modifying U.S. tax laws which will have an adverse effect in the 1992 process, U.S. companies may not share equitably in that growth.

COAL HERITAGE INITIATIVE

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, over the past couple of years I have developed in southern West Virginia what I call the coal heritage initiative. This coal heritage initiative reflects the renewed interest in our Appalachian culture and the heritage that has evolved, to a great extent, in the southern West Virginia coalfields as a result of the struggles and adversities faced by coal miners in the region during the late 19th century and the early years of the 1900's.

The basis for the coal heritage initiative is the historic preservation of the few physical vestiges remaining from that era. Throughout the region there are buildings, structures and sites with outstanding historical, cultural an architectural values relating to the coal-mining heritage of southern West Virginia. Many of these structures and sites have national significance and demand preservation for the benefit of future generations, educational purposes, and their tourism potential.

Historic preservation also comports well with our efforts to take advantage of and enhance the many natural, scenic, and recreational resources located in southern West Virginia; resources such as the federally designated rivers under National Park Service administration in the region, State parks and forests, and Army Corps of Engineers recreational lakes.

In a nutshell, the goal I am pursuing is the coordinated development and promotion of outstanding natural, scenic, recreational, cultural and historic resources within southern West Virginia with access by interstate highways and scenic roadways.

To date, we have made progress in setting the framework of the coal heritage initiative. A study has been completed by a nonprofit organization, Coalways, Inc., that represents a road map which can be used to plot the course of educational and tourism rated developments involving the unique cultural and historical resources associated with southern West Virginia's coal mining heritage.

Also, based on authorizing legislation I gained enactment of last year, the National Park Service was recently appropriated funds to conduct a coal heritage study that will identify sites of cultural and historical significance involving southern West Virginia's coal-mining heritage, evaluate the sites and identify a coal heritage trail linking these sites together with existing Federal and State park units and recreational lakes. In this regard, I would like to commend our senior Senator, ROBERT C. BYRD, for championing the fiscal year 1990 funds for this essential study.

What is lacking at the time, however, is a means to coordinate the various initiatives and proposals being advanced on the Federal, State, and local levels. For this reason, today I am introducing legislation that would establish a Southern West Virginia Heritage Preservation Commission to provide the means to recognize, preserve, enhance, interpret, and promote the coal-mining heritage of the region.

The purpose of this commission, to be comprised of private and public sector representatives, would be to make loans and grants from federally appropriated, or donated, funds to preserve and enhance significant cultural, historical, and architectural resources such as buildings, structures, and facilities associated with southern West Virginia's coal heritage; seek to coordinate governmental and private sector activities relating to historic preservation and economic revitalization; provide assistance in preparation of loan and grant applications to Federal agencies; and develop guidelines for the preservation of coal heritage sites. The legislation would also provide for a southern West Virginia coal heritage route along existing roads.

There is an unequivocal need for a dramatically increased historic preservation effort in southern West Virginia. In light of the resources at stake, I believe it appropriate for there to be some national role in the development of this initiative.

OVERCROWDED PRISONS

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, February 28, 1990, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

OVERCROWDED PRISONS

A huge gap exists between the number of crimes committed in the U.S. and the prison space now available to lock up criminals. The people who commit crimes know their chances of getting caught and sent to prison are slim. Overcrowding at both the state and federal level has reached crisis proportions.

The number of inmates in state and federal prisons has jumped from 316,000 in 1980 to over 673,00 by June 1989. Two major policy changes in recent years driving up prison populations have been mandatory sentencing laws requiring offenders to be incarcerated for fixed periods without parole, and tougher federal anti-drug and anti-crime laws. Four-fifths of the increase in the federal prison population in recent years has been drug offenders. Federal prisons are operating at 67% over capacity, while overcapacity at the state level is 23%. The federal prison population is expected to almost double over the next five years.

Indiana, like most other states, is faced with the problem of having too many criminals and too few prison cells. In addition to the 11,000 beds currently in use in state prisons, officials estimate a need of 3,000-4,000 more by 1994. Along with 42 other states, Indiana is now under court order to do something about its overcrowded prisons.

Overcrowding is having a major effect on the correctional system. Current space limits and court orders force state authorities to consider releasing criminals long before the completion of their sentences. The length of the average prison term has declined recently from 18 months to one year. If judges are deprived of the sentencing option of imprisonment to keep dangerous criminals off the streets, the correctional system cannot function properly.

In the long run, we must confront the underlying causes of the ever-increasing crime rate, by, among other things, expanding crime and drug abuse prevention programs and improving the economic prospects of the underclass. But in the meantime, the problem of prison overcrowding must be addressed. Several options are available:

PRISON CONSTRUCTION

Some new prison construction will be necessary to house dangerous criminals. The cost of new prison construction is daunting—some $50,000 per cell. States have stepped up their construction efforts, and the federal government is planning to add 42,600 beds to the 32,500 existing beds in federal prisons by 1995. Even with this dramatic increase in prison capacity, overcrowding will remain a problem. We are now locking up criminals in overcrowded and underfunded facilities, so alternatives simply must be considered.

ALTERNATIVE PUNISHMENT

One solution to overcrowding is not constant construction but imaginative approaches to alternative penalties for nonviolent offenders. A large percentage of prisoners who have committed drug-related crimes, for example, are not violent. States are now developing intermediate punishments, such as house arrest, intensive probation, compulsory addiction treatment, and work programs and community service carefully overseen by probation officers. Under house arrest, for example, an offender is confined to his or her home and checks in with probation officers several times daily. Ankle bracelets can be used for electronic surveillance of the offender's movements. Although more research is needed on the safety and efficiency of intermediate punishments, such alternatives could free up prison space for dangerous offenders, reduce the costs of incarceration, and permit nonviolent offenders to repay their debt to society as taxpaying members of the community.

While intermediate punishments could provide judges with more alternatives, changes may also be needed in mandatory sentencing laws. Judges are increasingly dissatisfied with the trend toward longer sentences without parole. Some states have decided that harsh mandatory sentencing is too inflexible to be effective. The debate is vigorous between those who want "lock-'em-up" justice and those concerned about the cost and effectiveness of long imprisonment.

CONVERSION OF FACILITIES

Short-term relief to prison overcrowding can come through conversion of unused public facilities into low and medium security prisons. Converting military bases and closed dormitories into prison space for those convicted of nonviolent property crimes or drug violations could free up prisons to handle violent prisoners, organized crime figures, and habitual offenders. A number of federal properties have been transferred to the states for such purposes, and seven minimum security prisons have recently been established on active military bases.

PRIVATIZATION OF PRISONS

Private contracting and operation of adult correctional facilities is a controversial alternative to the traditional approach. Proponents argue that private vendors, unencumbered by bureaucracy, could provide the same services offered presently by government in a more cost-effective and efficient manner. Several states already have low security prisons being operated by private companies. Various questions, such as the reliability of the estimated savings and the wisdom of turning prisoners over to private businesses, need to be resolved.

Addressing the problem of prison overcrowding will likely take a combination of efforts on a variety of levels. President Bush has called for increased spending on prison construction, expanded staffs at overcrowded institutions, the development of electronic monitoring, and the conversion of military facilities. Indiana is beginning to address its problems through the construction of a $56 million, 650-bed maximum security prison in southern Indiana; the conversion of the Camp Atterbury Fish and Wildlife Area into a low-to-medium security prison that will house up to 200 inmates; and the proposed development of a state-of-the-art computer system that would facilitate alternative programs by classifying inmates based on their crime, past history, and length of sentence.

Prison overcrowding is not likely to disappear soon. And determining the right policy mix of new construction, conversion, privatization, alternative sentencing, and crime prevention will not be easy. Yet if the proper steps are taken now, we can reduce the crisis of prison overcrowding in the 1990s.

CELEBRATION OF THE LOS ANGELES FREE CLINIC'S NEW BUILDING

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the Los Angeles Free Clinic on the opening of its new Seniel Ostrow Building.

The Free Clinic was founded 23 years ago. Since then, the clinic has provided a variety of free services to the community—including medical and dental care, family planning services, health education programs, legal and mental health counseling, and two telephone helplines.

Over 1 million individuals have been served by the clinic. All have benefited greatly by the clinic's philosophy that health care is a right and not a privilege. In that spirit, the clinic provides barrier-free access to its services in a confidential and nonjudgmental environment.

The new building is truly spectacular. The clinic now enjoys the distinction of being housed in the only building that was specifically designed as a free clinic. The new building has 28,000 square feet of clinical and administrative space, including a two-level parking structure, nine legal and mental health counseling rooms, seven medical examinations rooms, four dental operatories, a medical laboratory, and a pharmacy.

Mr. Speaker, certain individuals who were instrumental in raising the new building deserve special recognition. They are: Building fund cochairs Mimi West and Ellen Hoberman who raised $3 million from private sources for the new building; Joel Schwartz, chair of the clinic's facilities committee and president of the board of directors; and the clinic's board of directors. Also, I applaud the clinic's 450 volunteers whose dedication and hard work make the clinic such a unique place.

Mr. Speaker, my hat is off to the Los Angeles Free Clinic. I wish them the best of luck in their future endeavors and hope that they enjoy the new Seniel Ostrow Building.

THE INTERNATIONAL WIRE TRANSFER RECORDKEEPING ACT

HON. ESTEBAN EDWARD TORRES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, last week I introduced H.R. 4064, the International Wire Transfer Recordkeepng Act of 1990. This legislation is needed to fill a void in the war against international money laundering.

Currently, the Bank Secrecy Act requires that financial institutions keep a record of all international wire transfers and book transfers of credit involving more than $10,000. However, there are currently no specifications as to what type of information must be contained in these records. Thus, many of the transactions are done anonymously, providing cover for billions of dollars in drug profits to be laundered into the international banking system. Officials estimate that up to $100 billion in illegal drug profits are transferred out of the U.S. annually by wire.

My legislation would require domestic financial institutions and financial agents to include in the record the identity, address, and account information of the person originating the transaction, the recipient of the transfer, and any third parties or other beneficiaries involved in the transfer. While not impeding legitimate international commerce, my legislaion will certainly be a strong deterrent to those who have been using the international payments system for criminal means. Last year, the American Bankers Association recognized that, "Wire transfers, which are essentially unregulated, have emerged as the primary method by which high volume launderers ply their trade." Thus, I am seeking the support and cooperation of the banking industry to help shut down the illegal money laundering schemes involving international wire transfers. I also ask the support of my colleagues for this legislation by becoming cosponsors of the International Wire Transfer Recordkeeping Act.

THE AIRBORNE SELF-PROTECTION JAMMER

HON. C. THOMAS McMILLEN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to discuss the airborne self-protection jammer [ASPJ]. As some of you may be aware, the Air Force has eliminated funding for the ASPJ in the President's fiscal year 1991 budget. They have taken this action despite a dozen years of consistent congressional support for ASPJ. The Air Force has decided to cut this program because they have some questions regarding the test performance of ASPJ, and because they need to find some place to cut in their budget. But can the Air Force really afford to eliminate the ASPJ Program. The Navy, which has also invested considerable amounts of research and development funds believes that the ASPJ is absolutely necessary. Furthermore, every indication is that the ASPJ will indeed meet all expectations.

ASPJ is planned for approximately 2,200 Navy and USAF AV-8B, F-14, F-16, and F/A-18 aircraft. In constant year dollars the acquisition costs of these aircraft is approximately $60 billion. The acquisition cost of ASPJ to protect these aircraft is about $2.5 billion when purchased in economical quantities. That is what I call a leverage item. ASPJ is the most thoroughly tested system in the history of jammer developments. There have been over 8,000 hours of ground tests and 500 hours of flight test in the F-16 and F-18 aircraft. Any deficiencies in ASPJ relate more to the inability to define and provide the proper operational test environment than the ability of ASPJ to perform. For example, the measure of effectiveness criteria was so flawed that the Defense Acquisition Board declared that it must be redone. Amazingly, the important capability of ASPJ to prevent missiles from being launched wasn't even evaluated.

ASPJ is ready and it performs. There are over 400 Lantirn equipped F-16 aircraft and over 500 Navy F/A-18's that must have ASPJ today. The Air Force wonders if they can afford self protection. How can they not afford it? A 5-percent reduction in aircraft would provide sufficient offset for this critically needed protection. Where in the budget is the Air Force planning to provide protection for these high valued aircraft? Is there really a net cost benefit from other alternative systems considering planes and lives lost to a less effective system, not to mention the added cost and time needed to develop a replacement to ASPJ? The fact is, there are no other systems available that can do the job. Other existing systems have very limited threat capability and must be redesigned, combined, repackaged and retested in the F-16 aircraft. All of this for a system of less capable than the one we already have—ASPJ, the very type of leveraged system we need at this time of budget stretching. Every $1 million spent on ASPJ from this point forward will save us many millions more in saved aircraft or reduced force structure requirements. This is not the time to stop a very well conceived program after over $1 billion of expenditures, just when the cost and force structure benefits are being realized. ASPJ is in low rate production right now. As I stated before the Navy strongly supports the program. Reasonable public policy indicates that this low rate production should be continued by the Navy and Air Force without costly interruptions until the Defense Acquisition Board makes their determination for full rate production. The Air Force must continue its final verification testing of the ASPJ in the F-16 aircraft this year and should restore its support of the ASPJ Program in the 1991 budget. No other path makes sense.

TWENTY-FIRST CENTURY TEACHERS ACT

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I are very pleased to introduce today the Twenty-First Century Teachers Act. We accept the challenge that Congress is being called on to continue as a full partner in helping to restructure and reform our Nation's schools. Our Education and Labor Committee has an open and continuing dialog with the education community at-large, and this legislation reflects this relationship.

Our legislation is straightforward and focused on the development of human resources as the most important ingredient of school reform. We provide funds for individuals who want to commit themselves to teaching careers and matriculate in our Nation's colleges and universities; we provide funds for those institutions of higher education who will provide successful recruitment and retention programs for students preparing to enter the teaching profession; and we provide funds so that local education agencies, together with institutions of higher education and other eligible entities, may develop successful programs which reflect the best practices in school reform. Finally, we provide the support necessary so that excellent teachers at various levels from across the country will be nationally recognized and honored.

Over the past decade, the Congress has attempted to prevent funding cutbacks in education programs from preschool through adult education. At present, the President's budget does not fully reflect the funding necessary for this Nation's schools.

While I do not intend to rehash the findings of dozens of reform reports and studies over the past few years, I do want to reference two particular efforts as we introduce this legislation. In 1987 the Rand Corp. noted, > Growing enrollments, pending retirements, and educational reform initiatives have given rise to an increasing demand for teachers in the Nation's public schools. The supply of teachers, on the other hand, has been declining. It is anticipated that in 1992 the supply of newly graduated teachers will fill only two-thirds of the positions available. Inner city and rural school districts will have to contend with the effects of growing competition for teachers.

In that same year, the American Association of Colleges of Teacher Education reported that demographic data projected a future in which minorities would constitute a third of the pre-school-age population and nearly a third of the elementary and secondary school age population while, at the same time, the percentage of minority teachers was threatening to fall below 10 percent. The AACTE noted specifically that:

> The proportion of minority students enrolled in four year institutions where teacher education programs are offered, has declined, thus creating a smaller pool from which teacher education programs can recruit minority students;
> Large percentage of minorities attend two year community and junior colleges, which have low rates of transfer to four year institutions;
> Higher education is expensive and minority groups typically comprise much larger proportions of the low to middle socioeconomic status; and,
> Matriculation into certification following teacher education programs depends in many places on passing mandatory standardized tests; such tests have adversely affected the numbers of new minority teachers.

The Twenty-First Century Teachers Act reflects many of the good ideas and approaches proposed by our Senate colleagues as well as our previous committee efforts in this regard. This coming Saturday, we will be holding a hearing in Los Angeles on the bill, and by mid-March, the committee will be holding a hearing inviting a wide cross-section of individuals and organizations which will be most impacted by the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I commend this legislation to my colleagues and alert them to a forthcoming Dear Colleague letter on the bill. In the meantime, I would ask Members to call my committee office at 225-4944, Ms. Marilyn Marsh, if you wish to be added as cosponsors for the bill, or if you wish to obtain a copy of the bill.

We expect to move this legislation during the next couple of months in order that we, together with our Senate colleagues, may forward a bill to the President which will help him to become an education President.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO AMEND SECTION 503(b) OF THE BANKRUPTCY CODE

HON. JAMES H. (JIMMY) QUILLEN

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. QUILLEN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce legislation today which will amend section 503(b) of title 11 of the Bankruptcy Code to allow for the reimbursement of actual and necessary expenses incurred by official committees of unsecured creditors and equity security holders in performing certain statutory functions during the pendency of a chapter 11 case. Over the years, official committees have played an important role in the reorganization process. Chapter 11, enacted by Congress in 1978, is structured to provide a system premised on arriving at an acceptable plan by active participation of all persons in interest through negotiations.

The Bankruptcy Code mandates the appointment of an official committee to represent the interests of unsecured creditors as well as equity security holders. Interested persons negotiate with the debtor through these official committees. The principal duties of official committees, as specified by the Code, are to investigate the affairs of the debtor and to present their constituencies in negotiations with the debtor for a plan of reorganization.

The 1978 Bankruptcy Code reflects Congress' view that creditors and equity security holders could be adequately protected by assuring that adequate information was disclosed to them at the time their votes were solicited for acceptance of a reorganization plan and by providing an opportunity to participate in the reorganization in a formal capacity through the committee process. I believe, as Congress did when it passed the Code in 1978, that the official committee system is the best way to ensure that all persons are adequately represented and that a fair and equitable reorganization plan is formulated.

However, there is a growing concern that many interested persons are not participating on these official committees. I believe that there is a reluctance to serve on official committees in bankruptcy matters largely because of the uncertainty of being reimbursed for expenses incurred while participating in committee business. The allowance of actual and necessary expenses of official committees is not specifically provided for under the present section 503(b). As a result, many courts have interpreted this omission as requiring denial of these expenses. Participation by committees, particularly in large, complex reorganization cases often involves the expenditure of substantial expenses. This not only places a burden on committee participation, but it also jeopardizes the entire committee process. My amendment to the Bankruptcy Code would encourage all interested persons to participate, instead of only those persons to whom cost is not a factor. It should be noted that before a committee may be reimbursed for expenses it has incurred under the amendment, the reimbursement request must be approved by the bankruptcy court. Moreover, before the bankruptcy court will award such a reimbursement, the committee must show that it made a substantial contribution to the case.

I commend the work of the Commercial Law League of America and its bankruptcy and insolvency section. Their excellent work is the foundation for much of this legislation.

I am optimistic that this legislation will help encourage more active participation in the official committee process and help ensure fair and equitable representation in chapter 11 reorganization cases.

A HERO'S PASSING

HON. RICHARD E. NEAL

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. NEAL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it has been nearly 45 years since the end of World War II. In the ensuing five decades, Americans have enjoyed a period of relative peace and unparalleled prosperity which was won for us by the gallant soldiers, sailors, and airmen who fought their way from island to island in the Pacific, across the deserts of North Africa, and through the skies of Europe. Regrettably, our memories of their brave deeds are awakened most frequently now by the history books our children bring home from school, or notices in the newspapers when their ranks are depleted by death.

It was in the latter fashion that I learned of the passing on February 15, 1990, of one of the true heroes of World War II, Michael L. Arooth of Springfield, MA. Master Sergeant Arooth served as a tail gunner on an Eighth Air Force B–17 bomber, and is credited with shooting down 17 enemy aircraft in only 14 missions. In the process, he became the first American ace gunner of the war.

Michael Arooth's list of decorations and honors was lengthy and prestigious, as befitted his gallantry. Chief among his medals was the Distinguished Service Cross which he won for shooting down four aircraft on a single mission, including two after he had been wounded and was nearly unconscious from loss of blood. He was my hometown's most decorated combat hero of World War II. No city was ever prouder of one of its sons than Springfield was of Michael Arooth.

Mr. Speaker, the boys who won World War II and preserved the freedom we cherish are our senior citizens today. When they take their final leave, it is important that we acknowledge the extraordinary contributions they made to the history of our Nation and the world. Men like Michael Arooth might have seen themselves as simply doing their duty. But the uncommon dedication and bravery they brought to their tasks was the difference between victory and defeat for the United States and its allies. The surge of liberty we witness in Eastern Europe today would not have been possible without heroes like Michael Arooth wedged precariously in the tail sections of B–17's 45 years ago. To his son, David; daughters Carolyn and Virginia; brothers John and Joseph; sisters Ruth and Louise; and other relatives must go the thanks of a grateful Nation for the selfless service which Michael Arooth rendered at a time when his country was most in need.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE ROY OTIS DAY

HON. RALPH M. HALL

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. HALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, one of the great benefits of public service is to be part of the movement to better the system or at least observe works of public servants who dedicate their life to the political arena as a medium through which we can bring about, as the writer Jeremy Bentham said, "the greatest happiness of the greatest number is the foundation of morals and legislation"—such was Roy Day.

Roy Otis Day, former owner of a Pomona, CA, printing business and a longtime civic leader and political strategist, was known for 50 years as "Mr. Republican." Although I am a lifelong Democrat—I know when I observe an artist at work—and I deeply respect the Roy Day's across our country—those who make the political system work. In 1946, he managed Richard Nixon's first campaign for public office and remained a loyal supporter until his death in 1986, Mr. Day also managed the political campaigns for Representative Patrick J. Hillings, Representative John Rousselot and many other successful participants in the field of public service.

Roy Day was born October 20, 1900, in Pomona. He served in the Navy from 1919 to 1921 and soon afterward worked for the United Fruit Co. In Costa Rica. In the mid-1920's he joined the advertising sales staff at the old Pomona Progress, later purchased the newspaper's commercial printing equipment and built it into a multimillion dollar printing business.

A tireless community worker, Mr. Day served as president of the Pomona Chamber of Commerce, Pomona Central Business District Association, and Pomona Host Lions Club, and was a former member of the Pomona Planning Commission and the school board. Actually, Roy Day was a leader of every worthwhile project—Scoutmaster, Small Business Board of Advisors, YMCA membership drive, United Crusade, Navy League, Pomona First Baptist Church, Distinguished Service Award from the Jaycees, and you name it—he was a giver.

Roy was survived by his wife Florine, three loving daughters, Linda Baker, Patti Day, and Diana Brady, and one son Roy O., Jr., and five wonderful grandchildren Brandon Dickerson, Stacie Day Brady, Carolyn Brady, Sarah Beth Baker, and Andrew Baker.

Mr. Speaker, as we adjourn today, let us do so in remembrance of the wonderful public servant, Roy Otis Day, his wonderful family—and in tribute to the Roy Day's of the Nation—who give of themselves to make this a kinder and gentler and a happier nation.

Mr. Speaker, as we adjourn today, let us do so in remembrance of the wonderful public servant, Roy Otis Day.

HUMAN RIGHTS IN CUBA

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, today my colleague, ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN, and I are introducing a concurrent resolution expressing the sense of Congress that the United Nations Human Rights Commission should continue to investigate human rights abuses in Cuba.

The United Nations Human Rights Commission is presently meeting in Geneva to debate human rights abuses. Numerous human rights groups, including the nonpartisan America's Watch have pointed out the poor Cuba human rights record. The U.S. Ambassador to the UNHRC, Armando Valladares, also has personal experience in Cuban prisons.

In September 1988, the UNHRC sent a delegation, called the Cuba Working Group, to Cuba to investigate human rights abuses. Hundred's of Cubans came out to testify before the U.N. delegation. Reportedly more than 20 people who testified were subsequently arrested despite assurances against reprisals from the Cuban Government.

The U.N. delegation produced a 400-page report. The report drew no conclusions, but included testimony of "137 complaints of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."

Fidel Castro has dismissed the new Eastern European democracy as "counterrevolutionary." Castro has repeatedly rejected perestroika and glasnost. He continues to promote single party domination of the political process.

Last July, Castro had several members of the military, including Gen. Arnaldo Ochoa Sanchez, executed on "drug charges." General Ochoa had received the Hero of the Republic of Cuba medal, fought in the Cuban Revolution and was the commander of Cuban forces in Angola. He also favored glasnost and perestroika.

This resolution expresses the Sense of Congress that the United Nations Human Rights Commission should continue to investigate human rights conditions in Cuba. It further urges the UNHRC to appoint a Special Rapporteur to monitor human rights in Cuba as was done in Iran, Afganistan, El Salvador, and Rumania.

I urge quick passage of this important resolution.

INTRODUCTION OF THE COMPETITIVE NORTHEAST RAIL FREIGHT SERVICE ACT OF 1990

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to address a transportation crisis facing the economy of the Northeast, particularly upstate New York and Pennsylvania. This emergency arises from the bankruptcy of the Delaware & Hudson Railroad. The railroad's bankruptcy trustee has conducted a careful and even-handed bidding procedure to attract buyers for the railroad as a going concern. In this way, the trustee has sought to recognize and protect not only the legitimate interests of creditors, including the Federal Government and the State of New York, but also the broader public interest in the availability of competitive rail service.

At the culmination of this bidding process, the trustee has received an offer from the Canadian Pacific Railroad. However, the Canadian Pacific offer contained a contingency: To buy the D&H and operate it as a functioning railroad, Canadian Pacific would have to be assured of access to a critical interchange with two major southern rail carriers in western Maryland. And that interchange could be reached by D&H trains only if Conrail would cooperate by granting trackage rights over about 40 miles of Conrail track. Unfortunately, Conrail has adamately refused to arrange for the needed trackage rights, and now the survival of the D&H as a going railroad is directly threatened.

Normally, Mr. Speaker, we who fought long and hard to enact and then defend the Staggers Rail Act would argue for treating the dispute between Conrail and the D&H as a private-sector matter that is outside the realm of Federal transportation policy. In this instance, however, both the disputed route and one of the opposing parties are literally creatures of earlier Federal policy decisions.

Conrail itself was formed under Federal auspices out of the bankrupt northeastern rail carriers in the 1970's. After a decade of rehabilitation, including generous Federal assistance in matters ranging from labor protection obligations to abandonment of disused rail lines, Conrail was able to be successfully privatized through legislation enacted by the Congress in 1986, and implemented in 1987. Since then, Conrail has proven to be a successful and competitive participant in the freer transportation markets made possible by the Staggers Rail Act.

When Conrail was being designed by Federal planners in the 1970's, various routes and interchanges were awarded to Conrail or to other carriers in the Federal Government's grand design for Northeastern rail service, known as the final system plan. Under that plan, it was assumed that carriers serving the Southeastern and Mid-Atlantic regions would be assigned routes through Pennsylvania and upstate New York that would make it possible to compete directly with Conrail on traffic moving north and south along the eastern seaboard. The Delaware & Hudson was expected to be, in effect, a junior partner with these Southern railroads in competing with Conrail for the north-south traffic.

Actual events did not conform to the assumptions in the final system plan. The major Southern carriers were not given the direct connections with the D&H that had been expected. Shortly after the final system plan was adopted, the Interstate Commerce Commission reported that the D&H would be severely handicapped as a potential competitor to Conrail without suitable Southern connections. And quite prophetically, the ICC also warned that Conrail would be in a position to threaten the viability of the D&H by controlling the access of the D&H over various Conrail lines that were crucial to competitive connections needed by the D&H.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a decade and a half later, the prophecy has come true. The D&H is in bankruptcy, and even its last hope of survival as a unified operating railroad is threatened by Conrail. In this instance, Conrail's hard-line refusal to negotiate trackage rights of the Hagerstown route is a clear and present danger of the survival of any competition for Conrail on north-south freight traffic. Yet despite various entreaties by officials of the affected areas, Conrail has refused to cooperate regarding the trackage rights.

What the D&H needs is not charity, but a brought-and-paid-for trackage rights arrangement to move its trains directly across Maryland without traversing the Northeast corridor. This Conrail refuses to negotiate. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have reluctantly concluded that legislation is nesessary and appropriate to address this emergency.

I am taking this action only because I believe the Federal Government has an obligation to protect the public from a loss of rail service that is directly attributable to earlier Federal mistakes and oversights in the formation of Conrail. This legislation merely carries out the intention of the Congress that Conrail become a legitimate and health competitor in the American rail transportation system. Congress never intended that Conrail become a legitimate and healthy competitor in the American rail transportation system. Congress never intended that Conrail should become a regional monopolist as a result of governmental misadventure.

This bill is designed to guarantee the vitally needed trackage rights for the D&H, but on negotiated terms if posssible. The Interstate Commerce Commission is empowered to decide the amount of compensation if necessary, but that is a last-resort procedure to be used only if direct negotiations do not produce a viable trackage-rights agreement. This process is directly parallel to the powers the ICC normally has for guaranteeing access of one railroad to a terminal facility owned by another railroad. Constitutional principles of just compensation for property are observed, as are the requirements of due process. The only difference here is that this procedure is to be applied to a line of track about 40 miles outside the actual connection point, Hagerstown.

This modest and minimally instructive legislation is carefuly targeted to correct the Federal Government's past mistake in structuring the D&H and Conrail routes—and nothing more. I sincerly hope that Conrail will conduct prompt and fair good-faith negotiations with the D&H—or a successful bidder to purchase the D&H. A voluntary agreement is much to be preferred, but Government action can and must be taken to prevent the collapse of competitive rail service in an entire region—a collapse that can be controlled an manipulated by Conrail only because of a slip of the Federal pen.

TRIBUTE TO TOM REGAN

HON. ROBERT A BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Tom Regan, the Mayo Association of Philadelphia's "Mayo Person of the Year."

Born in Kilkelly Derrycastle in County Mayo, Ireland, Tom Regan came from a large family of four boys and five girls. After witnessing the bloody Easter Monday rebellion of 1916 in his homeland, Tom followed his two brothers and a sister to America.

A resident of Jenkintown, PA, Tom has been married to his wife Cecelia for 60 years. They have six children: Cecelia, Mary, Josephine, Nellie, Matt, and Tom.

Tom has been active with the Irish movement since he was 15. He has been the recipient of many awards honoring him for his work for the cause of Irish freedom and has served as founder, president, and manager of the MacSwiney Club in Jenkintown. Tom is even listed in Ireland's Book of Fame.

Mr. Speaker, the Mayo Association has chosen to add to Tom Regan's honors by selecting him as the 1990 Person of the Year. Tom Regan deserves this great honor for his lifelong dedication to peace, justice and unity in Ireland.

PICKETT URGES FULL COLA'S FOR MILITARY AND FEDERAL RETIREES

HON. OWEN B. PICKETT

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, for the second year in a row, President Bush has proposed that there be no cost-of-living adjustment [COLA] for our Nation's military and Federal retirees and that all future COLA's be reduced 1 percent. Only disabled annuitants would be excluded from these provisions.

The President's proposal is as wrong this year as it was last year, Mr. Speaker, and it should again be rejected.

Military and career civil service retirees recognize the need to reduce our budget deficit, and like most Americans, they are willing to do their part as long as the reductions are fair and equitable.

But this proposal is not fair. It singles out military and civil service retirees for cuts when beneficiaries of other Federal retirement programs are scheduled to receive full COLA's. It also comes on the heels of a decade-long effort to delay COLA's, reduce COLA's, eliminate COLA's, and extend the time-interval between COLA's.

All this for a group of Americans who devoted their most productive years to public service.

Mr. Speaker, the gentlelady from Ohio, Ms. OAKAR, who has been a champion of Federal retirees, has introduced legislation, House Resolution 3914, to protect our military and civil service retirees from this shortsighted and unfair proposal.

I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this important legislation.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE JACK LEWIS

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, on February 9, 1990, I was saddened to learn of the unexpected death of veteran Scrantonian Tribune editor and columnist and my friend of many years, Jack Lewis.

A native of Scranton, PA, Jack graduated from local schools before joining the U.S. Marine Corps and rose to the rank of sergeant during World War II. Upon his discharge, he joined the Scrantonian Tribune and rapidly moved up the ladder to become a correspondent, a staff reporter, copy editor and Sunday editor.

He was a member and a past officer of the Newspaper Guild and a member of the Holy Cross Athletic Association, Fifth Marine Division Association and Sloan Booster Association.

A fine athlete, Jack enjoyed tennis as a member of the Scranton Tennis Club and racquetball as a member of the greater Scranton YMCA. He was active in both sports until earlier this year. He also coached Little League baseball teams.

Our thoughts go out to his wife, the former Dale Thomas; three sons, Jack, an attache of the state attorney general's office; Jeff, an educator who resides in Washington, DC, and Glenn, of Atlanta, GA, a Marriott Hotel executive; a daughter, Mrs. Pamela Kane of Dunmore; a sister, Mrs. Jean Dowse of Scranton; five grandchildren; and several nieces and nephews.

THE IMPORTANCE OF EDUCATION FUNDING

HON. DONALD M. PAYNE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. PAYNE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my views on the importance of education to this country. I believe that education ought to be the primary concern of this Nation and I am committed to achieving excellence in education.

The challenge of educating is already complicated by societal factors ranging from drugs and educating homeless children to the technological demands of the coming 21st century. The challenge is heightened by the limited resources available to teachers and schools. Financially, the past decade has been devastating. Federal dollars to support education programs have disappeared. And now, we are faced with a situation where we must play catch up.

The President has named himself the "Education President" and we must hold him to that. We need more Federal dollars to pay teacher salaries, purchase laboratory materials and schoolbooks, provide teacher training, and to make education accessible to everyone.

As we enter the 1990's I can't help but to be reminded of the leadership exercised by the late President John F. Kennedy on education. He brought about a renaissance in education. He said that, "the education of our people is a national investment. It yields tangible returns in economic growth, and improved citizenry and higher standards of living."

These words still hold true today, and it is our responsibility to arm the children and adults of this Nation with a solid education. This is the best defense to the challenges presented by the changing world community. It is imperative that the level of education funding is commensurate with the high value we place on education. Quality education should be our legacy to the future generations.

TRIBUTE TO MERVIN ADAMS

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating Mervin Adams of Millersburg, PA, on his retirement.

Mr. Adams, a longtime resident of the 17th Congressional District, has been a faithful servant to his community. During his long career, he served 24 years on the board of supervisors of Upper Paxton Township, 18 years as roadmaster for Upper Paxton Township, 8 years on the executive board of State Association of Township Supervisors, and 2 years as president of the State Association of Township Supervisors. And he remains a member of the Dauphin County Planning Commission.

Mr. Speaker, I am always impressed and overwhelmed when I encounter citizens who selflessly dedicate themselves to the good of their neighbors and community. Such an individual is Mervin Adams, and on behalf of Dauphin County, I thank him for his distinguished work.

NAVAL ARMS CONTROL: ANALYZING SOVIET INITIATIVES WITH CARE

HON. DUNCAN HUNTER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to bring to my colleagues attention an article written by the Chief of Naval Operations, Adm. Carlisle Trost. As we being to examine our defense priorities it is essential that we take a good look at Soviet actions, not just words. Admiral Trost examines Soviet actions and makes a compelling case for the need to resist Soviet attempts to conclude the U.S.

Navy in arms control talks. I encourage all my colleagues to read this important article.

NAVAL ARMS CONTROL: ANALYZING SOVIET INITIATIVES WITH CARE

(By Adm. Carlisle A. H. Trost, U.S. Navy Chief of Naval Operations)

As the Soviet Union continues to make proposals about cutting conventional forces, a new wrinkle has been added. During his most recent visit to the U.S., Marshal Sergei Akhromeyev, Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev's senior military adviser, said that Moscow might not sign any agreement reducing conventional forces in Europe unless the U.S. agrees to open talks on reducing its naval forces.

We must analyze such a proposal with much care. Although we welcome the lessened tensions which characterize the current global political climate, we must be careful to avoid actions whose consequences may be injurious to the long-term political and economic health of both our country and our allies, as well as to many other nations which depend on us to assure the peace.

One key fact underlies any argument against cutting U.S. Naval forces: the U.S. is a maritime nation whose dependence on the seas is the bedrock of U.S. political and economic security. For the U.S., world trade routes are vital links—a lifeline—to other nations. The trade routes we use exchange more than 600 billion dollars worth of our country's annual exports and imports.

The materials and products shipped by sea directly impact our lives. Some are the products of the American farmer, worker or miner. In return, some are the products on which we, as a nation of consumers, have come to rely (imported autos, VCR's, TV's, home computers, etc.). And some, too, are materials which are essential to our industrial might and strategic security but which are not available naturally in our country. A few examples are tin, chromium, manganese ore and beryl—all items either totally or almost totally imported. And, of course, we now import 42 percent of our oil, a figure that can be expected to grow.

Couple these realities with the fact that as a nation our vital interests are expressed in a web of 47 treaties and alliances with binding coalitions for mutual defense. These relationships, together with commercial dependencies which evolve from them and which support our economy, shape our national security objectives. Stated simply, our global commitments set the environment in which we live, work and prosper. And the sea is what ties us, our allies and our friends together and makes our relationships viable.

The Soviet Union, on the other hand, is a self-sufficient land power with no dependence on the seas for its economic survival. Whatever resources it needs are available indigenously or from Warsaw Pact allies which directly adjoin the Soviet landmass.

Consequently, the reason for Soviet interest in limiting the size of the U.S. Navy is apparent. It is the Navy that ensures the ability of free nations to use the sea and to prosper in a multi-polar, interdependent world.

The U.S. Navy is a strong contributor to our national defense strategy. To execute this strategy properly and to protect our global interests and commitments, we have learned from hard experience that our national interests are best served by a forward strategy. This means a globally deployed Navy, ready to contain problems before they start and to deter potential adversaries from challenging free use of the oceans. Our presence in the Persian Gulf is a prime example of how our Navy, by being on the scene, sent a clear message and brought stability to a war-torn region—and kept the oil flowing. This forward posture—a deterrent posture—has kept global peace for nearly 45 years, keeping conflicts isolated to local regions.

So one might ask why the Soviet Union is demanding reductions in our Naval forces—the very same forces that have been so successful in doing exactly what the Soviets supposedly are striving for—achieving global peace? How do we reconcile this question when we see the Soviets, a self-sufficient land power, continuing to build new warships of every class at rates exceeding any reasonable defensive needs—aircraft carriers, submarines, cruisers, destroyers and frigates?

The Soviets, as advertised, are indeed retiring older, difficult to maintain ships. But this effort will simply allow them to focus their resources, material and human, on new and very capable ships and aircraft. Make no mistake about it. The qualitative capability of the Soviet Navy is increasing—even if their numerical advantage diminishes.

How, also, do we reconcile the fact that the Soviets continue to support third world surrogates with the most sophisticated military hardware? Continuing arms deliveries to Libya, North Korea, Cuba, Iraq, Nicaragua and Afghanistan seem inconsistent, at best, with public proclamations of a defensive strategy.

There are many pundits, caught up in the euphoria of the moment, who advocate proceeding as if the future holds only the certainty of peace. We must consider a longer view.

All that is certain about the future is that it will challenge us from many quarters we may not now fully appreciate. If we are to be prepared to meet those challenges, far from our shores, a Navy unrestricted in its mobility and capability—a potent, unfettered force free to operate on distant seas—is something we simply cannot do without. Only an experienced and ready Navy will have the capability of responding, as we have in the recent past, to the wide spectrum of threats borne on winds of technological and geopolitical change.

ESTONIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I join with Connecticut's Estonian Society in observance of the 72d anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of Estonia. Last year we witnessed miraculous events all over the world. The spirit of glasnost swept the world over, and independence from the Soviet bloc was experienced for many peoples throughout Eastern Europe.

As the saying goes, Poland won its freedom in 10 years, Hungary in 10 months, East Germany in 10 days, and Czechoslovakia in 10 minutes. But today, 72 years after declaring independence, the people of Estonia are still not the masters of their national destiny. Conditions may have eased, but their fate is still subject to the absolute dictates of the men in the Kremlin.

Estonia has remained a constituent republic in the Soviet Union since its incorporation in August 1940. The United States Government has never accepted the validity of the Soviet annexation of Estonia, and consequently, has not invalidated the recognition it accorded to the Estonian Republic in 1922.

Today, as the 72d anniversary of Estonian Independence Day approaches, I would like to commend the Estonian people for their unwavering commitment to freedom and dignity of every individual. We in this Chamber, along with the free people across this world, that someday soon the people of Estonia will be free again.

NEW POSTAGE STAMP HONORS PUERTO RICAN PATRIOT

HON. JAIME B. FUSTER

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. FUSTER. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues may have noticed the new postage stamp issued this month by the U.S. Postal Service, as part of its "Great Figures of America" series, which commemorates the late Luis Munoz Marin, who in 1948 became Puerto Rico's first popularly elected Governor. It is a rare distinction and a fitting tribute to the father of modern Puerto Rico, the man who created my island's Commonwealth relationship with the United States.

This inventive and widely admired act of statesmanship has provided the people of Puerto Rico with a dynamic political framework of self-government and fiscal autonomy within its broader association with the United States.

It was Munoz Marin who in the 1950's launched "Operation Bootstrap," the pioneering program which transformed Puerto Rico from agrarian poverty into industrial prosperity. Today, Puerto Rico is the model for rapid industrial development not only in the Caribbean but also throughout the developing world.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that we honor Luis Munoz Marin at a time when the Congress is considering legislation that would further enhance Munoz's vision of a Commonwealth status which was designed to evolve and grow to meet new realities in Puerto Rico.

From economic despair and political uncertainty, Luis Munoz Marin built the most steadfast democracy and the most prosperous economy in all of Latin America. Mr. Speaker, I well remember the words spoken by President John F. Kennedy when he awarded the Medal of Freedom to Luis Munoz Marin:

"Poet, politician, public servant, patriot, he has led his people on to new heights of dignity and purpose and transformed a stricken land into a vital society."

That superbly sums up the life of a remarkable man, the father of modern Puerto Rico. How fitting it is for the U.S. Postal Service to honor this giant among men, and I know my colleagues join in saluting this "Great Figure of America," don Luis Munoz Marin.

RETIREMENT OF DOROTHY CORINE WADLEY

HON. JACK BROOKS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this occasion to call your attention to the retirement of Dorothy Corine Wadley, an outstanding employee of this Congress who for the past 17 years has been a staff member of the House Judiciary Committee.

Dorothy Wadley worked on the Subcommittee on Crime, the Subcommittee on Monopolies and Commercial Law, the Subcommittee on Economic and Commercial Law, and for the past year on the Judge Walter L. Nixon special impeachment staff.

She was office manager on the Monopolies and Commercial Law Subcommittee and in this position edited all transcripts and proofread all of the subcommittee's outgoing documents. She also conducted legislative research and managed the work flow of the subcommittee.

She is a business education graduate of Florida A&M University and prior to joining the Judiciary Committee, worked for the office of Congressmen JOHN HEINZ III, and WILLIAM S. MOORHEAD. She also worked for the 1972 National Democratic Convention staff and subsequently for the Democratic Presidential Campaign.

Mrs. Wadley is very active in her church and is deeply involved in the Montgomery County Foster Care Program. She has contributed immeasurably to the work of the House of Representatives and I want to wish her the very best that life has to offer during her retirement.

FAY JONES AWARDED THE AIA GOLD MEDAL

HON. JOHN P. HAMMERSCHMIDT

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, Arkansas architect Fay Jones has been awarded the highest honor of his profession, the American Institute of Architects [AIA] gold metal.

In ceremonies at the White House on February 22, 1990, President Bush joined AIA officials, past honorees, associates, and celebrities in making the presentation.

A gala banquet that evening at the National Building Museum here in Washington, with the Prince of Wales addressing the assembly, provided further opportunity to honor Fay Jones and his work.

Fay Jones' "Ozark" style is characterized by the AIA as "use of native stone and natural woods that integrate the natural environment into the building design."

He has designed more than 200 homes, more than a dozen of which were featured in national magazines in the 1960's and 1970's.

Greater recognition, as well as his first AIA honor award, came from one of his churches, Thorncrown Chapel in Eureka Springs, AR. Architectural Record said Thorncrown:

> Accepts every nuance of light and registers every subtlety in the landscape. It is a brilliant testimony to the power of architecture to intensify experience and inspire contemplation.

Fay Jones received the bachelor's architecture degree with the first architecture class at the University of Arkansas in 1950. After graduate studies at Rice, he taught architecture at Oklahoma University.

In 1953, he apprenticed at Taliesin in Spring Green, WI. After 4 months, he took Frank Lloyd Wright's advice and returned to Fayetteville and the University of Arkansas to teach.

That same year, he founded an architecture practice that endures today as a partnership with Maurice Jennings, with the able assistance of Mary Elizabeth (Gus) Jones, his wife of 46 years.

Fay Jones succeeded John Williams as chairman of the Architecture Department in 1966 and became the first dean of the School of Architecture in 1974. After 2 years, he gave up administrative duties but continued to teach, concurrently working as an architect, until taking emeritus status in 1988.

It has been my pleasure and honor to know Fay Jones for over three decades. In 1981, we were fellow recipients of University of Arkansas distinguished alumnus awards.

Fay Jones is the 48th recipient of the AIA gold medal, taking his place among such other notables as Louis Sullivan, Frank Lloyd Wright, Philip Johnson, and I.M. Pei.

Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to have you and your colleagues join in recognizing Arkansas architect Fay Jones, his superior talent and excellence in design that have earned him and his work the highest accolade of his profession.

The presentation by the American Institute of Architects gold medal salutes Fay Jones as an architect:

> Who, for more than four decades, has created an exquisite architecture of gentle beauty and quite dignity that celebrates the land and embraces the American spirit. Complex yet delicate, grand in vision yet human in scale, bound firmly to the Earth yet soaringly spiritual, his work strikes an emotional chord that touches the soul of all who encounter it. Humble, original, intelligent, and uncompromising, he embodies everything that architecture can and should be.

BROWARD COUNTY BURIES SHERIFF DEPUTY JOHN W. GREENEY III

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this past Wednesday, south Florida buried one of its finest deputy sheriffs. John (Jack) W. Greeney III was killed in the line of duty by two men wielding semiautomatic weapons. Greeney and his partner, Robert Sallustio, were summoned by the silent alarm in a local fast food restaurant. Robert Sallustio's bulletproof vest saved him, and he is recovering in the hospital from several gunshot wounds. Jack Greeney was not that fortunate.

Deputy Greeney had public service and police duty in his blood: both his father and his grandfather served their communities as police officers. His father, John Greeney II, a former Cooper city police chief, went on to direct all Broward Sheriff's Office operations at Fort Lauderdale International Airport until he retired last year. Jack Greeney joined the military shortly after graduating high school, and by the time he retired from the U.S. Air Force in 1985, Greeney had attained the rank of chief master sergeant. He joined the Deputy Sheriff's Office in 1986.

Greeney's alleged killer is wanted in Massachusetts on two counts of assault with intent to murder and assault and battery with a deadly weapon. In spite of this, he easily purchased a gun in Dade County. Perhaps if a mandatory national waiting period were in place, the thug who fired on and killed Deputy Sheriff Jack Greeney would not have had access to such a deadly weapon. Certainly something must be done about the assault weapons such as the one that killed Deputy Greeney.

Jack Greeney loved being a cop and bravely and selflessly performed his duties. He was buried in Arlington National Cemetery in Virginia with full military honors. He is survived by his parents, John and Theresa, of Cooper City; sons John IV, Michael and Matthew; a sister, Patricia Huberig of Boca Raton; and a grandmother, Esther Greeney of Cooper City. I extend my condolences to Deputy Greeney's loved ones. South Florida will deeply miss this courageous spirit and mourns the loss of such a dedicated public servant.

FUTURE HOMEMAKERS OF AMERICA CELEBRATE FHA/HERO WEEK

HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, the Future Homemakers of America celebrated National FHA/HERO Week with the theme "Future Homemakers of America: Make a Difference."

During 1989 over 281,000 members in 11,000 chapters were involved in projects and activities that focused on such issues as substance abuse, AIDS prevention, peer pressure, teen pregnancy and parenting, helping the homeless, latchkey children, nutrition and fitness, and developing leadership skills on the job. The Future Homemakers of America continues to emphasize involvement by its members that allows them to develop skills for life—planning, goal setting, problem solving, decisionmaking and interpersonal communication—all of which are necessary in the world of work and home.

Last year in my home State of Kentucky 10,479 young people in 257 chapters participated in FHA activities and projects. There were 1,279 FHA members in the Second District of Kentucky, which I have the privilege of representing in the Congress. Chapter projects in Kentucky continued to focus on issues that deal with AIDS prevention, prevention of family violence, peer pressure, peer counseling, handicap awareness, child emotional abuse, stress management, and teen runaways.

The 1989 Kentucky State meeting was held at the Galt House in Louisville, with the largest attendance ever. 1,400 members, advisers, and parents attended the meeting April 20–22. The 1990 State meeting will be held in Lexington on March 29–31.

Two of the State FHA/HERO officers for 1989–90 are from the Second Congressional District of Kentucky. Monica Knight, who attends LaRue County High School, is the secretary; Tammie Evans, who attends Franklin-Simpson High School, is the first vice president.

Two FHA members from the Second Congressional District received medals during the national meeting in 1989. Shannon England, Caverna Chapter, won the gold medal in the category of job application and interview; Bridgette Harper, Breckinridge County Chapter, won the silver medal in the category of illustrated talk. FHA members from Kentucky received seven gold medals, five silver medals and one bronze medal during the recognition ceremony at the national meeting.

Three chapters in the Second Congressional District were recognized as "Chapters With Impact" last year. The Bowling Green High Chapter assisted police and dental offices in fingerprinting and making dental x-rays for parents to keep. The Washington County Chapter donated money to the student council to finance school projects. The Hart County HERO had a speaker on choosing a career and completing job applications and résumés.

The Barren, Caverna, Franklin-Simpson, Hart, Larue, West Hardin, and Spencer Chapters were named 1988–89 Honor Roll Chapters.

The Future Homemakers of America is an excellent organization, and I would like to commend Mrs. Jeanette Downey, who resigned as State adviser last April, and all of those who participate in FHA/HERO activities and projects for your service. I wish Ginny Ellington, the new State adviser, and all the members and advisers of the Future Homemakers of America continued success in all their future endeavors.

HOW THE HEALTH CARE CRISIS CURED ITSELF!

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to my colleagues' attention the following articles by John J. Iannantuono, CFP, ChFC., which are written in a prophetic manner.

They may provide insight on the health care crisis.

(October 1, 1999)

HOW THE HEALTH CARE CRISIS CURED ITSELF!

I was looking through old magazine and newspaper articles and what hit my eye was the frequency and intensity of the Health Care crisis a mere 10 years ago. Something that was so out of kilter is now not even given any attention at all in the press.

How did such an about face take place in such a short span of years?

If asked what the prime reason was for this change in the first place, my recollection is that Employers got so fed up with substantial medical insurance rate increases year after year that they just gave up and radically changed their insurance plans. They imposed really substantial deductibles and coinsurances. There was a lot of controversy.

First, just a few companies went to $1,000 deductibles and large coinsurances of (say) 60/40 percent on $15,000 of expenses. Employees really protested. But as experience data was coming in employers and employees began to realize this wasn't half bad. Most plans had become contributory anyway and the employees were soon welcoming the lower payroll deductions. Then the economic recession of 1992 set in with a big sting. Companies were forced to cut back in many areas so deductibles went up again. This time to $3,000, $5,000, and higher. Some coinsurances went to $25,000.

Interestingly and coincidentally, I guess, people started being much more conscious of the medical delivery system. At the same time the Providers of medical service (the hospitals and doctors) just had to be more sensitive to the pocketbook.

They weren't dealing with insurance companies as much as they had been in the 1970's and 1980's. Now they were going right into people's wallets because of those formidable deductibles.

Lots of people were taking responsibility for their own Wellness. Suddenly the light went on!

HEALTH INSURANCE HAD NOTHING TO DO WITH GOOD HEALTH!

By 1995 the government, in particular, had done a complete about-face. In 1991 and 1992 there was a host of laws passed giving employers and employees economic incentives for achieving good health. Tax deductions and tax credits—all for achieving wellness potential. The basics were promoted—weight reduction, cholesterol, smoking cessation, fitness.

School districts were given economic support for instilling the same Wellness objectives. Employers, because of the economic incentives and just because of the nature of the times, completed the cycle. The entire country now was on the same frequency.

The time was ripe for another phenomenon to fully evolve. There had been a fitness movement back then. Health Clubs, weight loss, lose this, end that, you name it! Employee Wellness programs which had heretofore been just token/lip service soon became fully developed parts of both large and small company culture.

Wellness! So simple, so easy! At the end of the 80's and beginning of the 1990's every politician, every legislator was bent on extending health care (you know, give everyone medical insurance).

But remember what was happening? Deductible and co-insurances were getting higher and higher, insurance for bottom end predictable expenses has disappeared. We collectively realized that health insurance had caused the health care crisis. Health insurance had completely overshadowed our individual responsibility to achieve wellness. And wellness is achievable!

Everything's back in perspective now!

As the twentieth century ends we still have medical insurance. It's really insurance nowadays. It covers only catastrophic losses, which is what insurance is intended for anyway. We still don't live in a riskless world. Thank God!

THIS IS HOW THE HEALTH CARE CRISIS CURED ITSELF—EDUCATION

Burn the Books! Imprison the Thinkers! Both are often used totalitarian methods to capture minds and bodies. On the contrary, academicians and lay people agree that the highest goal of education is to release the intellect sufficiently so that it realizes its unbound capabilities. Then, hopefully, the Renaissance person emerges, proficient in the arts and sciences. A contributing individual. An individual responsible for his own actions. Sadly, commonplace day-to-day life shadows such lofty goals.

By default we drift toward acceptance of less being normal. Consequently, for most, education captures and controls rather than promotes the inherent flights of genius. Those being "educated" are led to believe that something is being poured into them. This belief shifts responsibility if something goes wrong. And things do go wrong. Those being educated can refuse to be poured into. They can blame others for what goes wrong. Blaming others robs one of freedom. No responsibility, no freedom.

If education were to affirm and continually reaffirm that the process is actually an unfolding, not a pouring in, then there could be no shifting of responsibility. Whether or not the unbound capabilities are achieved becomes a matter of personal choice. We would all be somewhere on the continuum of unfolding.

Let's take a giant leap of logic. Intellectual unfoldment. If sold on the limitlessness of this human potential and it's affirmation as something inherent, then certainly wellness, another human potential, is just as limitless.

Presently, the collective thought, particularly the collective thought that students encounter, is that sickness is something that happens to you. It gets poured in, somewhat like the education process. Like educators, the professional class that manages the perceived pouring-in of knowledge, there is a professional class, the medical practitioners, that manages curing the sickness which happens to pour in.

For the Health Care Crisis to cure itself, educators will have to begin (and I believe they will) to affirm that the natural state is one of health. Students will learn to unfold their wellness potential. They will have a quite different collective thought.

Curriculum will be chock full of techniques for unfolding this inherent potential. Students will be responsible for the "degree" of wellness as well as the "degree" of intellectual success they achieve.

The professional classes that heretofore were perceived to pour in something can now transfer their energies to what they would rather be doing anyway. Educators and medical practitioners will now have a chance to focus on unleashing this potential and managing their students and patients progress. Their experience, knowledge, and skills will be greatly needed and tested as those they guide reach greater and greater heights of mental and physical accomplishments. It will be thrilling to rewrite the standards as they continually fall by the wayside.

The pouring-in thought is akin to the "Burning the Books" technique. It captures, imprisons, and removes the heritage of freedom and achievement through individual responsibility.

The unfoldment thought will cure the Health Care Crisis. Let's affirm it and empower ourselves.

JOHN J. IANNANTUONO, CFP, ChFC.

SUPPORT THE MAINE WILDERNESS ACT OF 1990

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing the Maine Wilderness Act of 1990, which will designate 12,000 acres of pristine forest in the White Mountain National Forest as part of the National Wilderness Preservation System. This area includes Caribou and Speckled Mountains and is one of the most scenic locations in the State of Maine.

This legislation represents a compromise that has been the subject of thorough review and study by the people of Maine, as well as the U.S. Forest Service. The entire Maine congressional delegation supports this legislation and a companion bill is being introduced in the Senate by Senator COHEN.

Currently, Maine does not have a federally designated wilderness area despite the fact that over 90 percent of the State is forested. Only Baxter State Forest and the Moosehorn National Wildlife Refuge have preserved large tracts of land in its natural state. Caribou-Speckled Mountain has been approved under the Department of Agriculture's second roadless area review and evaluation program [RARE II]. In addition, the Congress has made its own review and examination of National Forest System roadless areas in the Maine section of the White Mountain National Forest and of the environmental impacts associated with alternative allocations of such areas.

The Caribou-Speckled Wilderness designation issue has been debated for the past 5 years. The Forest Service has held 16,000 acres of the White Mountain National Forest under de facto wilderness status. As such, this land is indefinitely closed to timber harvesting and motorized vehicles.

In response to concerns from forest product users and environmentalists, the Forest Service and an ad hoc committee developed a compromise proposal that would list 12,000 acres as permanent wilderness. Selective timber harvesting would be permitted in the remaining 4,000 acres of the White Mountain National Forest where such harvesting is currently prohibited.

The ad hoc committee which considered this proposal was comprised of members of the wood products industry, environmental groups, multiple use proponents, and State and local officials. The overwhelming approval of this proposal by the disparate interests represented on the ad hoc committee is indicative of the true nature of the compromise incorporated in this legislation.

It is this compromise proposal that is incorporated in the Maine Wilderness Act of 1990. I believe that this legislation represents a true compromise between the various interests involved in this issue. The Maine delegation has made every reasonable effort to balance the needs of the wood product industry and multiple use proponents with the environmental concerns that some land be protected for future enjoyment.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud of Maine's reputation as a leader in protecting its precious environment. I believe that the Maine Wilderness Act of 1990 reiterates our commitment in preserving portions of this environment for the enjoyment of future generations. I would like to thank the individuals who participated in reaching this compromise. I look forward to working with my colleagues in the passage of the Maine Wilderness Act.

AMERICAN LEGION HONORS ERNEST NYE

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, one of the national organizations which continues to make an extremely important contribution to our deliberations on public policy is the American Legion. For those of us who serve in Congress it is an extremely useful resource for information about veterans programs—how they are working, what is needed to improve them, and what veterans think about them. In my own district, the American Legion benefits from the volunteer efforts of a number of active and thoughtful people, and I find myself very dependent on their advice when it comes to matters affecting veterans.

Recently, one of those dedicated volunteers, Ernest Nye, was honored by his friends and colleagues. Ernie has been commander of district 9 of the American Legion in Massachusetts and has performed the duties of that demanding job with great distinction. I was pleased to be one of those attending at the Venus de Milo in Swansea, MA, last Saturday night when leaders of the American Legion, elected officials and others paid a very deserved tribute to this hard working and able leader. Mr. Speaker, in recognition of the important work which American Legion does and of the countless hours of volunteer time which members of the Legion so willingly contribute to the good of others, I ask that the program from the dinner in honor of District 9 Commander Ernest Nye be printed here.

TO THE STALIN MAUSOLEUM

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, we are all heartened by the historic events which are sweeping across Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. In this age of glasnost, perestroika, with the promise of emerging democratization, we are filled with the hope that the age of living in the shadow of global war may soon draw to a close.

But it is precisely at this juncture where we in the United States must not be blinded by our hopes for the future, but instead we must focus clearly on the realities of today. This cautionary note is eloquently and convincingly stated in a historical analysis which appeared in the winter issue of Daedalus, journal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. In the article, the author, writing under the pseudonym "Z," both warns of the wounded bear, and gives a prescription for avoiding Tianamen Square type events from happening in the Soviet Union. I strongly urge all of my distinguished colleagues to take the time to read the full text of "To the Stalin Mausoleum," as it appeared in Daedalus.

Mr. Speaker, reprinted below is an abridged version of the "Z" article as it appeared in the January 4 issue of the New York Times, and a brief analysis by Mr. William Safire.

TO THE STALIN MAUSOLEUM

(The following article is adapted from the conclusion of a longer historical analysis to be published under the pseudonym "Z" in the winter issue of Daedalus, journal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Daedalus is withholding the author's name from all parties at the author's request. (Although it is not The New York Times' usual practice to withhold an author's identity, it is honoring Daedalus' commitment.)

(By "Z")

It is clear that 1989 will enter history as the beginning of Communism's terminal crisis, and not just in Russia but from the Baltic to the China Sea, and from Berlin to Beijing.

It is also clear that perestroika and glasnost, welcome in their intention, have in their application only aggravated the systemic crisis they were intended to alleviate. They have done so because, like all forms of soft Communism, they go against the logic of the system they are trying to save.

Mikhail Gorbachev has been trying to promote soft Communism through structures and population programmed for hard Communism. But the latter is the only variety of Sovietism that is the genuine article, for the essence of all varieties of Sovietism is party supremacy. Thus, the instrument of Mr. Gorbachev's reform—the party—is the basic cause of Sovietism's troubles.

The way out of this contradiction? As one Soviet reformer put it after the June Congress: "The country now stands at a crossroads. From here we either go the Chinese way or the Polish-Hungarian way." Although he obviously wished for the latter course, the alternative he posed may well be a Hobson's choice.

The Chinese way since June 1989 means relative, though now declining, market prosperity under a regime of political and military repression. Repression is certainly a possibility in Russia, but market prosperity is out of the question for the indefinite future. Conversely, the Polish-Hungarian way means genuine democracy, but in the midst of economic ruin so severe as to threaten the survival of the new constitutional order.

In Russia, the economic ruin is even worse than in Poland and Hungary, but real democracy, as opposed to mere democratization, is not even on the agenda. Thus, the Russian way could well combine the worst of the Chinese and the Central European scenarios: economic failure in conjunction with an inexpugnable leading role for the party.

Indeed, all paths of Communist reform seem to end in one or another type of impasse. Leninist regimes, when they enter their final decline, seem able only either to implode, as in Poland, Hungary, East Germany, Czechoslovakia and Rumania, or to dig in their heels militarily to stave off implosion, as under Deng Xiaoping in 1989. And this grim impasse at the end of utopia in power is the outcome of the structures that power built. The whole impossible enterprise of Lenin and Stalin was sustainable only as long as the human and material resources on which the system fed retained the vitality to endure the burden of the regime, and as long as some modicum of material success undergirded the party's monopolistic position.

When these conditions ceased to hold, beginning with Deng Xiaoping's marketization of 1979 and Solidarity's revolt of 1980, the Communist parties' will to power began to flag and their people's habit of fear began to fade. For the Soviet party-state's survival, this development soon made necessary the expedients of perestroika and glasnost. But these are only pale substitutes for the market and democracy, halfway measures designed to square the circle of making the vivifying forces of a resurrected civil society compatible with the party's leading role.

But this circle cannot be squared. If marketization and privatization are the economic goals of reform, then party planning becomes superfluous, indeed downright parasitical. If multiple parties, elections and the rule of law are the political goals of reform, then the dual administration of the party-state becomes supernumerary, indeed positively noxious.

There is no third way between Leninism and the market, between Bolshevism and constitutional government. Marketization and democratization lead to the revival of civil society, and such a society requires the rule of law. But civil society under the rule of law is incompatible with the preservation of the lawless leading role of the party.

At some point, therefore, the line will be reached where reform crosses over into the liquidation of the leading role and all the structures it has created. Russia and Central Europe are reaching that critical line. The false problem of how to restructure Leninism is now giving way to the real problem of how to dismantle the system, how to effect at last an exit from Communism. Perestroika is not a solution but a transition to this exit. As Milovan Djilas foresaw early in perestroika, Communism is not reforming itself—it is disintegrating.

So, as we rub our eyes in astonishment at the most stunning Communist implosion of all, the collapse of the Berlin wall, we should not conclude that the structures it shielded for so long can be transformed by a few reform decrees. The revolutionary rapidity of events in 1989 should not breed the illusion that the exit from Communism these events presage will itself be rapid.

And the most difficult case of all will be the Soviet Union. Russia, after all has had 70 not 45 years of Sovietism. Also, the Soviet party is a national institution, not an alien imposition, with deep roots in the patriotic success of World War II. Finally, this national-imperial party has the military apparatus of a superpower.

Can Mr. Gorbachev succeed? Should we help him? To answer these questions meaningfully, we must first rephrase them. Succeed at what? Help him to do what?

If by perestroika's success we mean producing a Communist system that is economically effective and politically democratic, then the answer must be no. The fundamental structures of the Leninist system reached an inextricable impasse at the end of the 1970's, and the mounting contradictions of perestroika indicate that the system cannot be restructured or reformed, but can only either stagnate or be dismantled and replaced by market institutions over a long period of time.

In this case, any aid the West might render to the Soviet state to save or improve the existing system would be futile: On this score, Mr. Gorbachev is beyond our help. Such aid would also work against the real interests of the restive Soviet peoples and thus of international stability. Like Western credits to Poland in the 1970's, aid to the Soviet Government would only prolong the agony.

Yet, if by perestroika's success we mean effecting a transition from a party-state and a command economy to democracy and the market, then the answer unfortunately must still be no. First, such a transition is not the aim of perestroika; its aim, rather, is to salvage what can be saved of the system by halfway-house concessions to economic and human reality.

Second, and even more important, such a transition would bring the end of the cardinal leading role and hence would amount to the self-liquidation of Communism, something Mr. Gorbachev clearly does not intend to do.

Still, events are pressing toward the eventual dwindling away of the system, whatever the Soviet leadership's intentions and whoever that leader might be in the future. And here Western help could pay a constructive role.

First, reducing the mutual burden of armaments, if carried out with due attention to legitimate security concerns, would ease the severity of the Soviet crisis (though it would not alter its structural causes). And Mr. Gorbachev has clearly indicated his willingness to engage in arms reductions, while taking care that the Soviet Union's international retreat does not turn into a rout.

Second, although Western aid should not go to shoring up Soviet economic institutions in the state sector, it could be usefully applied to the piecemeal development of parallel structures in a private sector operating on market principles so as to promote economic and, eventually, political pluralism. This could take the form, say, of free economic zones operating under international Monetary Fund conditions in such places as the Baltic states, Armenia or the Soviet Far East. In this case, the expectation would be that such a parallel sector, perhaps with its own convertible currency, would eventually spread across the Soviet Union.

Such a policy is, indeed, a modest approximation of the approach that the Government is now inaugurating in Poland. But what Mr. Gorbachev is prepared to accept for his outer empire in Central Europe (where he effectively lost control sometime in 1988) would be much more difficult for him to accept for the inner empire of the Soviet Union itself, since foreign investment would imperil national sovereignty.

So Western investment, in joint or other enterprises in Russia, would have to be handled without triumphalism about capitalism's superiority, and with due sensitivity to Soviet national pride. The West's aim should be to encourage the change of Soviet realities while leaving the old labels intact—in a kind of socialist-emperor-of-Japan arrangement.

Yet, however the Soviet Union edges toward its particular exit from Communism, this uncharted process can only be long and painful. Nor will it be a unilinear or an incremental progress toward integration in some "common European home." Instead, further crises will most likely be necessary to produce further, and more real, reforms. And a last-ditch attempt to stave off ruin by curtailing destabilizing reform altogether could lead to that military reaction so feared by Moscow liberals.

And—who knows—in this scenario Mr. Gorbachev might be agile enough to become his own successor, or if perestroika ends in another 18th of Brumaire, to be his own Bonaparte. Mr. Gorbachev would be hard to replace, because his international reputation is now the Soviet Union's chief capital asset yet he could not afford to be a very tough Bonaparte, since he has become the prisoner of his foreign policy successes.

Obviously, none of these prospects is a cheering one, and none would be easy for the West to live alongside. But it is better to look realistically at the genuine options in the East as they have been molded by 70 years of failed utopia than to engage in fantasies about Mr. Gorbachev as a demiurge of instant democracy or about the end of conflict in history. Nor should we forget that Communism, though a disaster in almost every creative domain, has always been supremely successful at one thing: resourcefulness and tenacity in holding onto its monopoly of power.

The Soviet world's transition to normality will be a long time coming. The party, though now dyed with the hues of glasnost and democratization will cling to the bitter end, like some poisoned tunic of Nessus, around the bodies of nations it has enfolded in its embrace for so many decades.

THE Z DOCUMENT: "MR. X" IN OUR TIME

(By William Safire)

WASHINGTON.—The cold war is over; the free world won and the evil empire lost; let's pick a date for V-C Day and celebrate the history-ending victory over Communism." So say our triumphalists.

"The cold war is over; it was largely our uptight right-wingers' fault to begin with because the Russians were never coming." So say our sore winners.

Gorbophiles and Gorbophobes are on all fours in the same mindset: it's all over but the happy distribution of the peace dividend.

A ragtag band, taking exception to this consensus, is derided by both sides as unreconstructed cold warriors, skunks at the garden party of the nifty 90's. From Moscow, Brezhnevite retreads accuse us of howling because we were deprived, cold turkey, of our beloved Communist enemy.

We dissenters from the widespread wow-ee worldview have been reduced to Yogi Berra geopolitics—"the cold war ain't over till it's over." We mutter that Mr. Gorbachev is motivated only by the threat of incipient collapse, not by an interest in abandoning iron control. We warn that as soon as the West ameliorates the economic pain, the necessity for glasnost and free enterprise will lessen and the totalitarian system will survive.

Now, in the nick of time, comes substantial intellectual underpinning for the don't-save-Communism gang.

The American Academy of Arts and Sciences is based in Cambridge, Mass., not exactly a reactionary redoubt. The Academy publishes a quarterly, Daedalus, named after the Athenian who built an ingenious labyrinth.

Next week, an article will appear in that review titled "To the Stalin Mausoleum" (a play on Edmund Wilson's "To the Finland Station," about Lenin) and signed by "Z," a pseudonym recalling the "X" used by George Kennan a lifetime ago in suggesting a policy of containment.

Z surveys the 70 years leading to the political graveyard in a way that illuminates this past decade's events. Awareness of looming disaster began in Yuri Andropov's K.G.B.; the Novosibirsk Report by the sociologist Tatyana Zaslavskaya in 1983 "implied the necessity of radical restructuring for sheer survival"; its leaking (touted in this space) "first alerted the world to the impending end of Soviet stability."

Gorbachev was "Andropov redux," and at first tried to revitalize the Communist Party; when that failed, he built a parallel apparat—"reminiscent, mutatis mutandis, of the way Stalin had used the N.K.V.D. against the mainline Party."

Recent elections, held to insure Gorbachev against Khrushchev's fate of removal by the Central Committee, had an unintended result: "to produce a resounding defeat not just for the apparat, as Gorbachev wished, but for the Party as an institution. . . . the Party, which had hitherto inspired fear in the people, suddenly came to fear the population. . . ."

But the people's interests are not being served by the Communist Party or Gorbachev's parallel Sovietist apparat; private cooperatives were corrupted by the local political mafias, and decentralization was subverted because it threatened the party's monopoly of power. Result: "Gorbachev is left with the worst of two possible worlds: an old one that refused to die and a new one without the strength to be born."

Excerpts from the conclusion of Z's analysis are printed on this Op-Ed page. If they pique your interest, glom on to the magazine or insert yourself into the samizdat of faxes and photocopies that will follow the publication of the seminal article.

Gorbachev, trying to be both Luther and the Pope, cannot fix the stultifying system without going much further than he says he is willing or able to go. But, warns Z (an ideological soulmate whose identity I have no need to know), "decaying superpowers do not go quietly into the night."

In the historical epoch aborning, don't join the crowd expecting serenity or preaching stability. And don't start spending that peace dividend; as Tocqueville observed in Z's keynote, "The most dangerous time for a bad government is when it starts to reform itself."

INTRODUCTION OF THE MAINE WILDERNESS ACT OF 1990

HON. JOSEPH E. BRENNAN

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Speaker, today I and my fellow Representative from Maine, OLYMPIA SNOWE, have introduced legislation to designate as wilderness 12,000 acres of the caribou-speckled mountain area of Maine. We have taken this action to protect this pristine and unspoiled area, one of the last possible wilderness areas in Maine, from development for all time.

Caribou-Speckled Mountain is part of the White Mountain National Forest, and the U.S. Forest Service recommended wilderness designation for the area in 1985. There has been extensive public debate regarding the wilderness proposal: The Maine delegation created an ad hoc committee, representing all concerned parties, to fomulate a consensus use plan for the region. The committee recommended a wilderness designation in 1985, and a public hearing was held on the proposal in Bethel, ME, in 1988.

This legislation demonstrates the State of Maine's commitment to protecting the northern forest, and at the same time addresses the concerns of the lumber industry. The bill will permanently protect 12,000 acres, and releases 4,000 acres for mixed use, including a limited amount of logging.

The Maine Wilderness Act is a significant step forward in the fight to safeguard Maine's and the Nation's, precious natural resources from development. I urge my colleagues to support this progressive and important legislation.

EXCELLENCE AMONG BOY SCOUT TROOP 777

HON. HELEN DELICH BENTLEY

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, the Boy Scouts in my district are a very special group of citizens—in fact they are outstanding. They are so outstanding that I make it a point to recognize every Boy Scout in my district that receives the Eagle Award. All of them are great, but one troop deserves special recognition. That is Troop 777.

On January 14, 1990, I participated in an Eagle Scout Ceremony at Troop 777, which is sponsored by the Bel Air United Methodist Church of Bel Air, MD. The troop has been in existence since 1953 and beginning in 1963 has produced 34 Eagle Scouts or approximately 1 Eagle Scout for each of 31 registered. Nationally, in 1989 out of 4,246,915 Scouts registered, only 30,189 achieved the Eagle rank, or 1 in 140.

Three Troop 777 scouts were recognized on this occasion with the rank of Eagle; Jason Hall, Stephen Hill, and Matthew Sedgley all from Bel Air, MD. Each of these young people surpassed the necessary requirements of receiving over 25 merit badges and other awards for their participation in troop activities.

Another scout, George Paul Kuck II was the recipient of his second Silver Palm Award. This was the first time in the 37 year history of Troop 777 that a Body Scout had accomplished this feat. Once I realized what this young man had to accomplish to attain this award, I was amazed and even more proud of him. In order to receive this award, he achieved 30 merit badges beyond those required for the rank of Eagle. The merit badges he received in order to qualify for his second Silver Palm Award were: archery, botany, chemistry, dog care, emergency prep., energy, general science, handicap awareness, insect study, motor boating, nature, personal fitness, pets, rifle shooting, space exploraton, and weather. Truly George Paul Kuck III deserves this recognition of his accomplishments as a member of the Boy Scouts of America.

Scoutmaster Paul Kuck, his assistants and all of the volunteers of this troop are to be commended for their hard work, dedication and motivation on behalf of these fine young people. As their Representative in this Congress, I commend them and wish Troop 777 the best in the future.

THE FEBRUARY 25, 1990 NICARAGUAN ELECTIONS

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, February 28, 1990

Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to recognize and commend the Nicaraguan people for the peaceful, free and fair election that took place on February 25, 1990. Most importantly, however, I would like to congratulate the UNO candidate, President-elect Violeta de Barios Chamorro, who the Nicaraguan people have chosen over the incumbent, President Daniel Ortega and his Sandinista one-party rule. This democratic election will pave the way for improved relations between Nicaragua and her Central American neighbors, the United States, and the international community.

As the first truly free election in Nicaragua, the registered voters have demonstrated a commitment to democracy. Although preelection polls indicated the UNO coalition and Ms. Chamorro trailing President Ortega, a tendency attributed to general fear of revealing a vote, there was clearly no trepidation felt by the voters as the 1.75 million registered Nicaraguans spent up to 4 hours in line to cast their ballots.

The Nicaraguans have elected a woman who has been the political symbol of the freedoms and peace from which the Nicaraguans have been deprived in the past. President-elect Chamorro, publisher of the only opposition newspaper in Nicaragua, has received the unquestioned confidence of the people of Nicaragua.

Ten years ago, the Sandinistas overturned the oppressive Somoza government with promises of a democratic system. Instead, the Nicaraguan people have been subjected by the Marxist rule of the Sandinista forces. The Sandinistas maintained a centrally planned economy which was ravaged by mismanagement. It brought falling production, continual shortages and spiraling inflation which ran up to 1,700 percent last year. It seems that not only have the Nicaraguans chosen the freedoms represented in a democracy, but they have also chosen Chamorro's vision of a market driven economy in hopes of improving the production base and standard of living that has thoroughly deteriorated under the Sandinista regime.

Like the rest of the Communist world, it seems Nicaragua has joined the movement toward the freedoms and privileges enjoyed by other democratic nations. From Eastern Europe to Central America, the Communist theory is meeting its end. It has been refuted as both a political theory as well as an economic one. Nicaragua has now joined the ranks of those nations who participate in free elections in the presence of a political pluralism. The Nicaraguan citizens have enjoyed the opportunity to experience a balloting system that is not fraught with fear and oppression but with the freedom of choice. The Nicaraguan people have seized this opportunity to move toward political pluralism by choosing their leaders through the voting box and ending the one-party rule by the Sandinistas.

For 10 years the United States has been in support of the democratic opposition in Nicaragua and together we have worked toward the ultimate goal realized this weekend; an election in which the opposition has the opportunity to be represented. During this 10-year span, it has been the United States, led by the policies formed under the Reagan administration through the "Reagan Doctrine" that has been the driving force in keeping the opposition's desire for democracy and freedoms alive. Had it not been for the support provided by this country, there is every possibility that the results achieved over the weekend may never have taken place. We would have turned our backs on the people of Nicaragua, who, as it has become apparent, truly sought the freedoms and the privileges accompanied by democracy. With our assistance, the opposition has spoken, and the people have chosen.

I sincerely hope that the transition will be one that is established on reconciliation and peace. The Sandinistas and President Ortega must be commended for their commitment to holding a free election and for sticking to that commitment. Now, the Sandinistas must continue to prove their commitment by allowing a smooth transition to the new government.

It is time for reconciliation in Nicaragua after a decade of a crumbling economy, radical political policies, and internal turmoil which has spread to neighboring countries. Nicaragua has finally seen the fruits of democracy. The road will now be long in reforming the political and economic structure that was established under the Sandinista regime. The United States and the international community need to reanalyze their Nicaraguan policies. With the leadership of President-elect Chamorro and her opposition coalition, Nicaragua will have the opportunity to move into the economic mainstream of the international community. I hope that we may now recognize Nicaragua as a nation in whom we will see reflections of a true working democracy with leaders elected by the people and a market-oriented economic system.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.
